American Conservatory Theater, a Tony Award–winning nonprofit organization in the heart of San Francisco, nurtures the art of live theater through dynamic productions, intensive actor training, and an ongoing engagement with its community. Under the leadership of Artistic Director Carey Perloff and Executive Director Ellen Richard, A.C.T. embraces its responsibility to conserve, renew, and reinvent its relationship to the rich theatrical traditions and literatures that are our collective legacy, while exploring new artistic forms and new communities. A commitment to the highest standards informs every aspect of A.C.T.’s creative work.

A.C.T. opened its first San Francisco season in 1967; more than 320 A.C.T. productions have since been performed to a combined audience of more than seven million people. Internationally recognized for its groundbreaking productions of classical works and bold explorations of contemporary playwriting, A.C.T.’s performance, education, and outreach programs annually reach more than 250,000 people.

A.C.T.’s conservatory, led by Melissa Smith, serves 3,000 students every year. In 1996, A.C.T.’s efforts to develop creative talent for the theater were recognized with the prestigious Jujamcyn Theaters Award, and with its commitment to excellence in actor training and to the relationship between training, performance, and audience, the A.C.T. Master of Fine Arts Program has moved to the forefront of America’s actor training programs, while serving as the creative engine of the company at large.

American Conservatory Theater was founded in 1965 by William Ball. Edward Hastings, Artistic Director 1986–92

San Francisco’s Theater Company

American Conservatory Theater Founding General Director William Ball, at the forefront of the regional theater movement, wanted to create a company outside New York that would have a significant national impact while providing an alternative to commercial theater. After a group of San Francisco civic leaders attended A.C.T.’s West Coast debut at Stanford University in 1966, they invited Ball and his company to settle in San Francisco, which was without a resident theater company. A.C.T. has been dedicated to bringing the power of live theater to San Francisco audiences since the company’s first rousing performance of Ball’s Tartuffe in the Geary Theater (now called the American Conservatory Theater) on January 21, 1967.

A.C.T.’s majestic stage opened January 10, 1910, rising from the rubble of the catastrophic earthquake and fires of 1906. It was immediately hailed as one of the grandest playhouses in the United States. In 1975 the Geary was awarded a place on the U.S. Department of the Interior’s National Register of Historic Places and named a landmark of the State of California and the City and County of San Francisco. In 1989 the Loma Prieta earthquake ripped a gaping hole in the ceiling, destroying the proscenium arch and dumping tons of equipment and debris on the first six rows of orchestra seats. Nevertheless, A.C.T.’s second artistic director, Edward Hastings (who succeeded Ball in 1986), never considered canceling the season. For the next six years, A.C.T. performed in seven different venues around the city. “We had to encourage people to come back to this devastated, ravished, magical place called San Francisco,” remembered Hastings. “And what they found in the theater were a lot of other people who were shook up. So there we were, all together in a theater, helping bring the city back together again.”

With the support of a community that contributed to a record-breaking $28.5 million capital campaign, the Geary reopened in 1996 with a production of The Tempest directed by A.C.T.’s current artistic director, Carey Perloff, who took over after Hastings retired in 1992. Committed to proving that theater is still “a place where language is kept alive and functional and muscular and breathing,” Perloff reconfirmed A.C.T.’s mission to expose San Francisco to exceptional works from across our rich theatrical tradition. She reintroduced the core acting company (which had been disbanded decades earlier) to keep top-quality local actors working, and she committed herself to “locavore” theater—theater made by, for, and about the community that supports it—with San Francisco–centered productions like After the War, The Tosca Project, and the much-beloved 2011 hit Armistead Maupin’s Tales of the City.

Since the company’s founding, A.C.T. has infused the Bay Area with some of the best young acting talent in the nation. The company first began training outside actors in the summer of 1967, and by 1969, the conservatory had expanded to include a year-long course of study, which has since evolved into the three-year, fully accredited, top-ranked Master of Fine Arts Program. M.F.A. Program students often grace the mainstage and return to perform at A.C.T. as alumni; they are also regulars on stages around the Bay Area and beyond. Other programs include the Young Conservatory, which offers training and performance opportunities for students ages 8 to 19; Studio A.C.T., which offers acting classes for adults; and the Summer Training Congress, which attracts students from around the world.

With the recent introduction of an education department and an increased presence in the Central Market neighborhood with the opening of a new performance space (The Costume Shop) and the purchase of the Strand Theater across from UN Plaza, A.C.T. is poised to continue its leadership role in securing the future of theater for San Francisco—and the nation.

Dear Friends,

“Do you believe in the life to come?” Clov asks Hamm halfway through Endgame. “Mine was always that,” Hamm replies.

There is something both hilarious and heartbreaking about the enormous longing embedded in Beckett’s characters. Trapped in frustrated lives devoid of incident, they long (like all of us) for escape, for love, for release, for transcendence, for amusement, for a better way to pass the time. “What is there to keep me here?” muses Clov. “The dialogue,” Hamm quickly asserts, reminding us that, when we watch Beckett, we are not only watching life being lived, we are spectators at a play. In Endgame Beckett introduces us to a consummate “ham” actor, who begins by saying, “Me—to play,” as he attempts to launch a final great performance in the losing chess match of his life. There are wonderful metatheatrical jokes scattered throughout the script, as when Clov turns his telescope towards the audience and says, “I see a multitude . . . in transports of joy. (Beat) Now that’s what I call a magnifier!”

Perhaps the reason Beckett has always held such fascination for consummate theater animals is that his work is simultaneously very rich psychologically and hugely entertaining theatrically. His characters are trapped within the confines of the play the way we are trapped within the confines of our lives, and unlike characters in a naturalistic play, Beckett’s characters comment on their strange fate as theatrical actors. Beckett uses the metaphor of the “long run” in the theater to explore the repetitive pattern of everyday life. He asks us to imagine ourselves as actors who repeat the same lines in the same order again and again in the “play” of our lives; a part of us wishes the run would end and we could be released from the inferno of our own personal play, and part of us lives in terror of the moment that play will be over and we will cease to exist.

This is the central metaphor of Beckett’s brilliant and rarely produced Play, which we have chosen to pair with Endgame for this production. Play presents three adults who endlessly repeat the conditions of their marital infidelity from someplace in limbo long after the affair has ended. Each is permitted to speak only when a light shines in his or her face, a light that is both intrusive and life-giving, both the light of the stage and the light of the sun. The light, which the actors in the first production called “Sam” in honor of its author, exposes the outrageous lies and sudden, desperate moments of honesty that occur when we have to confess our bad behavior. I am thrilled to give our remarkable core company a chance to exercise their well-honed ensemble muscles by performing a play that is structured like a complex piece of chamber music, and to juxtapose Play with Endgame to contrast two Beckettian explorations of marriage and family. In Play we see the corrosive effects of longing and betrayal on a marriage; in Endgame we see both the salutary effects of a shared life (in the relationship of Nagg and Nell) and the complex tug-of-war between fathers and sons (Nagg/Hamm and Hamm/Clov). Both are comedies with dark underbellies; as Nell mordantly observes, “Nothing is funnier than unhappiness.”

In part this Beckett evening came about as a result of thinking about my 20th-anniversary season next year. I had begun making lists of the artists who have been important to me and to A.C.T. over the years; that list led me straight to Bill Irwin, and my conversations with Bill led to our mutual adoration of Beckett and Bill’s desire to collaborate again with our core company. Many other interesting conversations ensued as a result of my anniversary list-making, and the sum total is the 2012–13 SEASON of plays, which we are delighted to share with you now.

There are many threads that made up the pattern of A.C.T. over the past 20 years, threads I wanted to make sure to include in this landmark season: international work, a new exploration of Greek tragedy, one of Tom Stoppard’s Wittiest romances, unusual music- and dance-theater collaborations, Bay Area–themed work, and a Canadian surprise. A 20th anniversary marks a moment to look back and assess, but even more importantly, it is a time to look to the future and to invest in new ideas and new ways of working.
My production of Sophocles’ ELEKTRA, in a newly commissioned translation by Timberlake Wertenbaker (Hecuba), will bring the beloved Olympia Dukakis back to A.C.T. as the Chorus Leader in this extraordinary timeless thriller about vendetta, matricide, and memory. Elektra will be scored by David Lang, the Pulitzer Prize–winning composer of so many memorable A.C.T. productions, including The Difficulty of Crossing a Field, Hecuba, Phèdre, and Mary Stuart.

Complementing Elektra is the world premiere of a mordant new comedy, DEAD METAPHOR, by acclaimed Canadian writer George Walker, about the perilous self-reckoning of a young sniper who comes home from Iraq to a pregnant wife and a country in the midst of a toxic election. From Vigil to The Overcoat to Two Pianos, Four Hands, Canadian theatrical work has sparkled at A.C.T. over the past two decades, and we’re thrilled to continue the cross-border love affair with Walker’s brilliant new play.

Of the many American classics that have bloomed on the Geary stage during my tenure, few are as beloved as Tennessee Williams’s A STREETCAR NAMED DESIRE, which first introduced A.C.T. audiences to Marco Barricelli in the role of Stanley. Associate Artistic Director Mark Rucker will bring this passionate and poignant southern drama to life in a steamy new imagining of the play featuring core company actors René Augesen as Blanche and Annie Purcell as Stella.

Juxtaposed with this classic will be one of the most original new theater pieces I have encountered in all my years as artistic director: a Chinese-American tale of immigration and imagination entitled STUCK ELEVATOR. Recounting the true story of a Chinese deliveryman who gets stuck in an elevator in the Bronx but doesn’t dare to push the emergency button for fear of deportation, Stuck Elevator is a wildly imaginative hip hop opera filled with gorgeous music, hilarious hallucinations, poignant longing, and inventive direction by Chay Yew, one of our favorite collaborators.

No A.C.T. anniversary season would be complete without Tom Stoppard, and in honor of this occasion we are returning to perhaps the most beautiful of all of Tom’s plays, ARCADIA. It was during the “diaspora years” following the 1989 Loma Prieta earthquake that I first staged Arcadia for A.C.T. (at what was then called the Stage Door Theatre) and met Tom, so it seems fitting 20 years later to bring this brilliant and romantic play back to the American Conservatory Theater. One of the joys of Arcadia is its beautiful roles for young actors, which will be filled by some of our extraordinary Master of Fine Arts Program students, in collaboration with an all-star cast of A.C.T. favorites. We present Arcadia in honor of Stoppard’s 70th birthday and with gratitude for the decades of pleasure that his work has brought to A.C.T. audiences.

Finally, we are thrilled to bring to the Bay Area the National Theatre of Scotland’s revolutionary production of BLACK WATCH, a globally acclaimed tour de force inspired by interviews with soldiers who served in Iraq with Scotland’s nearly 300-year-old Black Watch regiment. This hauntingly powerful depiction of war is so inventive and groundbreaking in its scope that it demands a completely unique performance venue, and we will be taking over the long dormant Drill Court at San Francisco’s historic Mission Armory for this incredible event. Deploying innovative stagecraft to create a visceral and emotionally riveting theatrical experience, Black Watch promises to be a truly unforgettable, once-in-a-lifetime experience.

In response to all of you who have begged for a repeat performance of Lorenzo Pisoni’s hugely acclaimed HUMOR ABUSE, we have managed to snag the amazing clown himself for a return visit of his delightful coming-of-age story in August. And we have one more amazing mainstage production we will announce very soon.

And that’s not all! In our funky new Costume Shop venue we are presenting a whole season of “New Work, New Communities, and New Audiences,” mixing world premiere productions (Jennifer Haley’s FROGGY and captivating conservatory productions (HAPPY TO STAND) with music, spoken word, and more. We hope The Costume Shop will ignite the Central Market neighborhood and pave the way for our exciting reconstruction of The Strand Theater, which will reopen in 2014 as A.C.T.’s new second stage, a home for risk-taking new work, reimagined classics, intimate theatrical experiences, and great dining. Stay tuned!

A.C.T. is bursting with energy these days, and none of it would be possible without the most energetic and adventurous audience in the country. It is YOU who have kept me here for 20 years, and I am deeply grateful for your participation in our work during this time. Here’s to many more theatrical adventures together!

With thanks,

Carey Perloff, Artistic Director

TONY AWARD WINNERS JOHN KANDER AND FRED EBB—one of the most prolific, acclaimed, and beloved songwriting teams in musical theater history—were no strangers to dark source material before beginning work on The Scottsboro Boys. Their biggest hit, Cabaret, captured the seedy underworld of a 1930s Berlin nightclub as the Nazis began their rise to power. In Chicago—currently the longest-running revival in Broadway history—slinky Jazz Age murderesses gleefully sing about how their felled men “had it coming.”

The genesis of The Scottsboro Boys, their final collaboration before Ebb’s death in 2004, began around Ebb’s kitchen table in 2002. Kander remembers, “One of us proposed an idea: What if we write a musical about a true story—one based on an important chapter in American history.” As they sifted through landmark court trials of the 20th century, the infamous Scottsboro case quickly jumped out as potent material.

In 1931, nine young African American men were falsely accused of raping two white women on a train in Alabama. Their swift conviction by an all-white jury kicked off decades of appeals and retrials for the Scottsboro Boys, as they became known, whose plight inspired the early civil rights movement.

“Behind the headlines, the spectacle, the ongoing trials, and the histrionics of politicians and lawyers was the story of nine young African American boys, determined to prove that they mattered,” Kander continues. “How was it possible that a group of innocent boys could be destroyed by a single lie? Why was it easier to believe that lie than it was to accept the truth?”

As they had done with vaudeville in Cabaret, Kander and Ebb used a historical theatrical form, the shocking and taboo minstrel show, to tell this wrenching tale, juxtaposing the pop and flash of song and dance with the harrowing details of the trial—and its devastating consequences. The inventive staging of director/choreographer Susan Stroman (a five-time Tony Award winner best known for The Producers) brought a rousing physicality to the production, further igniting the engrossing story.

A.C.T. Artistic Director Carey Perloff says, “Susan Stroman is an American treasure whose work has never been seen on the A.C.T. stage. With The Scottsboro Boys, Stroman manages to fuse astonishing dancing with heartfelt and complex storytelling in a unique and masterful way.”

A coproduction with The Old Globe in San Diego, A.C.T.’s production of The Scottsboro Boys features a cast of actors from all over the country (including several members of the original Broadway production). Tony and Emmy Award winner Hal Linden (Barney Miller, The Rothschilds on Broadway) joins the cast for the A.C.T. run only.

The Scottsboro Boys begins performances on June 21 for a strictly limited engagement.

In Such a Place, and in Such a World

BY MICHAEL PALLER

In November 1957, Alan Schneider, soon to direct the American premiere of Endgame, wrote to Samuel Beckett that the New York Times might ask him to write an article about the play prior to its opening. If he wrote it, he promised to run it by Beckett first. Beckett replied that he had no interest in discussing the meaning of his work with either journalists or critics. In any case, the play was simple as far as he was concerned: “Hamm as stated, and Clov as stated, together as stated, nec tecum nec sin te, in such a place and in such a world, that’s all I can manage, more than I could.”

Nec tecum nec sin te: I can’t live with you or without you. Hamm and Clov’s predicament in Endgame is as human and as recognizable a situation as there is. Later, Schneider wrote, “Beckett himself had always stressed that he was writing about what he termed a ‘local situation,’ i.e., Hamm and Clov (as well as Nagg and Nell) were individual personalities operating in a given set of circumstances. They were not to be considered as abstraction or symbols, or as representing anything other than themselves.” This was Beckett’s intent in all of his work.

For a long time, it seemed impossible for critics to consider Beckett without invoking such terms as “abstract,” “abrid,” and “existential.” Thanks largely to these efforts, his work acquired a reputation, especially among those who hadn’t seen the plays, of being difficult, dry, unapproachable—a forbidding, dolorous evening in the theater.

Beckett became famous with Waiting for Godot. First produced in a time and a place—Paris, 1953—where the existentialism of Jean-Paul Sartre, Simone de Beauvoir, and Albert Camus was all the rage, its stark, stripped-down quality, in which Vladimir and Estragon wait in a desolate place for a figure who never arrives, seemed to dramatize precisely the condition that the existentialists were describing: a world devoid of meaning until we give it one, in which we stand paralyzed before a universe that refuses to acknowledge us.

Had audiences known Beckett’s novels, at the time languishing unread in warehouses, they would have discovered that he had little interest in existentialism per se or in making oracular pronouncements about man’s position in the universe. Abstractions held little attraction for him. Waiting for an unknown Resistance member to deliver a message, or hiding in a small town in Vichy France, not knowing whether the Nazis or the Allies would arrive first: concrete experiences like these interested him, because he had lived through them. Conditions in a Normandy town called St.-Lô, destroyed by the Germans in 1944, interested him. In 1945 he lived there among a traumatized populace in a bombed-out landscape, serving as a volunteer quartermaster and interpreter in a Red Cross hospital. By all accounts his work was determined and unstinting. His last official act was providing poison to kill the rats that threatened the hospital’s maternity and children’s wards.

Beckett the Disciple

James Joyce encouraged the young writers in his circle, including Beckett, to write about what they knew. “In the particular,” he told them, “is contained the universal.” Beckett eventually freed himself from the gravitational pull of Joyce’s influence (no two writers are more unalike), but he heeded this advice. His plays, poems, and prose are replete with echoes of his life, but he stripped them of their external references so that what’s left are the experiences themselves. In this sense, they are abstracted, but they are not abstract.

Beckett knew well, for example, the complicated ties that connect Great Man and disciple. In his Parisian flat, Joyce made himself the center of attention, positioning his chair in the middle of the room, the better to command and regale the admirers he cultivated. Beckett became one of his most ardent helpers, making himself useful in a hundred ways: running errands, taking dictation, performing research, writing an article in praise of the then-unpublished Work in Progress (which became Finnegans Wake), all without pay. He went so far as to wear the same kind of patent leather shoes that Joyce wore, and in the same size, though Joyce’s feet were much smaller than his. The result was corns and calluses, and for as long as Beckett put himself in Joyce’s shoes, he walked in considerable pain. Beckett’s intense emotional bond was not equally felt by his idol, however, who was appreciative of Beckett’s devotion but saved his love for his family. He was, as one of Beckett’s biographers, Deirdre Bair, writes, “a man who had little need for relationships except when they could be useful to him.”

Beckett: Caretaker and Son

Beckett also knew the relationship between ill person and caregiver. When his beloved father, Bill, suffered a heart attack in 1933, Beckett lovingly cared for him, bathed and shaved him. It was the first time in his life, Bair notes, that Beckett felt needed and useful within his family. His relationship with his mother, Mae, was more complicated. She dominated his life during his Dublin childhood and kept it up when he was a grown man. They could hardly be together without simmering in mutual resentful silence. or bursting into vehement recrimination. Yet when he was stabbed in a Parisian street in 1938, Mae rushed to his hospital bedside and sat vigil for many days. Her action healed the breach between them, and Beckett wrote of this episode to a friend, “What a relationship!” The reconciliation was temporary, however, and he spent much psychic energy in the coming years trying to separate himself from her. When she was dying in 1950, it was Beckett’s turn to sit by the bedside, although whether out of love or duty, resentment or relief, or some unknowable combination, is hard to tell.

Similarly he cared for his aunt Cissie Sinclair and his brother, Frank, when they were dying. Stiffened by years of rheumatoid arthritis, Cissie was confined to a wheelchair (“Straighten up the statue,” she cheerfully instructed visitors), and Beckett would push her along the paths near her house. She had a telescope that she trained on the bay to watch the ships pass and the birds wheel. In addition to Beckett’s visits, it was one of the few pleasures of her final days.

In 1954, Frank was diagnosed with lung cancer. Beckett ministered to him for four long, dreadful months. He described the experience in a series of letters: “And so soon it will have been another day and all the secret things inside a little worse than they were and nothing much been noticed,” he wrote, and later, “Things drag on, a little more awful every day, and with so many days yet probably to run what awfulness to look forward to,” and, “Waiting [is] not so bad if you can fidget about. This is like waiting tied to a chair.” Shortly after these two deaths, he began Fin de partie, the original French version of Endgame.

Beckett and Women

Beckett also knew the pangs and pleasures of marital affairs. He had many of varied length and intensity during the 51 years that Suzanne Deschevaux-Dumesnil was his companion, and Beckett’s biographers speculate that she knew of at least some of them. In 1961, he and Suzanne married after being together for almost a quarter century. Beckett went through with it because he wanted to ensure that Suzanne, who had no rights of inheritance as a common-law wife and had done much to bring his work to the world’s attention, would have a sufficient income if he died. James Knowlson, Beckett’s authorized biographer, suggests that the marriage had a devastating effect on Barbara Bray, a young British woman with whom Beckett was then involved (and continued to see following the wedding). Beckett had doubtless hurt Suzanne with this affair; with the marriage, he injured Bray. And Beckett, the poliitest of men, never wanted to hurt anybody.
Reality of Situation and Character
When actors asked Beckett questions about his plays, his response tended to emphasize the reality of character and situation. When he directed Endgame in Berlin in 1967, he told the actors to play it as if the fourth wall of realistic drama stood between them and the audience. Clov’s one wish, he told them, is to get back to his kitchen, while Hamm’s is to detain him. That simple conflict, he said, was the center of the play. It had nothing to do with philosophy. He told actors in early productions that Hamm and Clov were Godot’s Vladimir and Estragon late in their lives—also that they were himself and Suzanne when they were going through a period best characterized as nec tecum nec sin te.

However one describes them, the characters in Endgame and Play, and in all of Beckett, are human—painfully human. Beckett himself was prone to depression and despair, but those who knew him attest to his dogged spirit and determination to go on. “Hamm,” he told the actors in Berlin, “says no to nothingness.” This is human, too, and noble. One thing it’s not is abstract.

On Play
BY MARJORIE PERLOFF

A man and two women—wife and mistress—caught in the eternal triangle. Each woman thinks she is The One and despises her rival. The man has accommodated both sexually—“What a male!” says W1 (the wife), admiring his potency—but seems passive and unengaged as the ladies duke it out. And these are indeed “ladies” with respect to class: genteel and well-off, both are given to such phrases as “I rang for Erskine” (the butler) or “I suggested a little jaunt to celebrate, to the Riviera or our darling Grand Canary.”

But Play is hardly a drawing-room comedy, not even a parodic one. The three-way catfight, for starters, can only be a language game, for the principals are encased up to their neck in tall urns. And the spotlight (more properly a searchlight) projected on their faces, first in unison, then one at a time, acts as Grand Inquisitor: the light signal turned on W1 ritually prompts her speech until it is interrupted by a shift to W2 or M. He said, she said, with no end in sight. What makes it all so hellish—indeed we are witnessing one of Beckett’s many versions of Dante’s Inferno—is the necessity of telling it again and again: the three characters are forced to remember and rehearse the endless petty details that characterized their responses to the affair. When the curtain finally comes down, following the stage direction “Spot off. Blackout. Five seconds,” we come right to the word “REPEAT.” And now the whole cycle is repeated!

When Play opened in London in June 1963, its first review, written for the Observer, was by Barbara Bray, the former BBC script editor who, having fallen in love with Beckett a few years earlier, moved to Paris to be near him. This move evidently made the playwright so nervous—he guarded his privacy very carefully—that he decided it was time to legalize his union with his companion of more than two decades, Suzanne Deschevaux-Dumesnil. They married in 1961 and remained together even though the marriage did little to change the status quo: soon Sam was seeing Barbara again. And she later made no bones about being the model for the Other Woman in Play.

Given this situation, Bray’s Observer review seems admirably detached and good-humored. “All three characters,” she writes, “are ordinary, mediocre, lamentable: in short painfully familiar. The man, scooting breathlessly back and forth between the two women, is perhaps the worst of the bunch: all need and weakness and feeble, if amiable duplicity. Of all Beckett’s works so far, this is the one that most openly approaches the everyday experience of any audience. . . . Here are people in all their funny, disgraceful, pitiable fragility, and all the touchingness, in spite of everything, of their efforts to love one another and endure.”

Parodic send-up of the clichés of everyday life? This is how Play is usually perceived, but there is a curious twist. Watch and listen carefully, especially the second time around, and you will become aware of the difference between the man and his two women. While both of them continue to bicker back and forth, the man whom Bray calls “the worst of the bunch” becomes more and more aloof and contemplative, finally murmuring, “To think we were never together.”

What can this mean? M has already admitted that he and W2 have been much together and he has obviously been together with W1, his wife. M’s next line is:

Never woke together, on a May morning, the first to wake to wake the other two. Then in a little dinghy—

And with the repetition of the “little dinghy, on the river, I resting my oars,” M seems to withdraw into his own memories. “Such fantasies,” he remarks, ignoring W1’s complaint about “hellish half-light” and W2’s accusation: “A shade gone. In the head. Just a shade. I doubt it.” “We were not civilized,” M remarks tersely, and a moment later he repeats, “Such fantasies. Then. And now—,” his ruminations leading up to the question, “Am I as much as . . . being seen?”

Being seen by whom? As the drama winds down, M no longer seems aware of either of his two women: his memories have carried him elsewhere. Indeed, M’s references to “dinghy,” “face,” and “such fantasies” recall the language and imagery of Krapp’s Last Tape (1958), Words and Music (1961), and the late television piece . . . but the clouds . . . , the title of which is taken from one of Beckett’s favorite poems, W. B. Yeats’s elegy for lost youth called “The Tower,” in which death is dismissed with some bravado as “but the clouds of the sky / When the horizon fades, / Or a bird’s sleepy cry / Among the deepening shades.”

In her absorbing memoir How It Was, Anne Atik, whose husband, the artist Avigdor Arikha, was one of Beckett’s best friends in Paris, recalls that when Sam came to dinner, he frequently recited “The Tower,” which he knew by heart. He was especially taken by the stanza:

Does the imagination dwell the most
Upon a woman won or woman lost?
If on the lost, admit you turned aside
From a great labyrinth out of pride,
Cowardice, silly over-subtle thought
Or anything called conscience once;
And that if memory recur, the sun’s
Under eclipse and the day blotted out.

What Yeats meant here is that the most painful of memories is that of the love one could have had but rejected because of caution or cowardice. Beckett picks up on this theme again and again, as in these lines from Words and Music:

She comes in the ashes
Who loved could not be won
Or won not loved . . .
Like in that old light
The face in the ashes.

And now comes the cryptic line: “The face. [Pause.] The face. [Pause.] The face.”

The Face. In Play, where only faces are visible, this motif comes to a head. It is a face that haunts M, but hardly the face of W1 or W2. Fond as he is of both, his memories of them cannot compare to the memory of the love felt for a third woman—the “woman lost,” whose “slit” eyes haunt the protagonist of Krapp’s Last Tape and . . . but the clouds . . . . In the latter, the protagonist asks, “For had she never once appeared, all that time, would I have, could I have gone on begging all that time?”

According to the biographers, Beckett’s “woman lost” was probably Peggy Sinclair, the young woman he renounced because she was his first cousin and a hopelessly unsuitable match. Peggy was to die of tuberculosis when she was only 23 and Sam 28. The beautiful irony of Beckett’s Play, in any case, is that, even as the two women vociferously compete for M, his heart is with a third party. “To think we were never together.” The phrase, repeated again and again, applies to all three characters because none of them are ever truly “together.” Like the prisoners in Dante’s First Circle of Hell, they are fated to repeat their lines again and again, never escaping their “urn burial,” the spotlight’s that pursue them, or their inner selves. There’s a lot of comedy and cliché in Play, but in the end, its love story is only too real.

A.C.T. Directors Circle members play a leading role in the artistic success of A.C.T. Each season, they collectively choose a production to sponsor; this year, they chose to support Endgame and Play, helping to bring the legendary Bill Irwin back to the mainstage to star in Beckett’s iconic dark comedy, paired with the remarkable (and rarely performed) short work Play, featuring A.C.T.'s acclaimed core acting company.

Directors Circle members demonstrate their passion for live theater with annual contributions at one of three membership levels between $2,000 and $11,999. By helping to bring innovative, groundbreaking productions to the Bay Area, producing compelling reinterpretations of classical works, and providing Bay Area students with educational experiences and exposure to live theater, Directors Circle members actively strengthen the future of the theatrical art form.

By joining the Directors Circle, members also deepen their relationship to the productions and the artists at exclusive events throughout the season, from lively meet-the-cast receptions to the exciting season preview reception.

During the run of Endgame and Play, Directors Circle members will be welcomed at a technical rehearsal in the theater, the opening night dinner, and a Saturday Salon with director Carey Perloff.

For more information about the benefits of Directors Circle membership, please contact Jonathan Frappler at 415.439.2353 or JFRAPPIER@ACT-SF.ORG, or visit WWW.ACT-SF.ORG/DONORLEVELS.
You already know that A.C.T. is a world-renowned nonprofit theater company and a cornerstone of the Bay Area’s vibrant artistic community, but there is a lot more going on here than what you see on our mainstage.

2012 Season Gala

More than 400 guests attended A.C.T.’s 2012 season gala, Expect the Unexpected, which raised more than $760,000 for our actor training and arts education programs. Chaired by Patti Rueff, the lavish evening at The Regency Center included the performance of an original musical, Tales of A.C.T.!, featuring Young Conservatory alumnus Darren Criss (of Glee and Broadway fame), A.C.T. Associate Artist Bill Irwin, and Tales of the City stars Patrick Lane and Betsy Wolfe, as well as students from the A.C.T. Master of Fine Arts Program and Young Conservatory and members of A.C.T.’s Board of Trustees, many of whom made their stage debuts. Tales of A.C.T.! was also enjoyed by 180 Bay Area high school students and teachers, who watched from the balcony before attending a catered reception with Criss and other performers.

“We are deeply humbled by the generosity of our donors,” says A.C.T. Artistic Director Carey Perloff. “Because of their generosity—and the generosity of our talented performers—A.C.T.’s conservatory will remain at the forefront of actor-training programs in the country and our year-old education department will continue to grow in wonderful ways.”

For years, new plays that view the world through the eyes of young people have been coming out of A.C.T.’s Young Conservatory’s New Plays Program. Last month YC students performed Brad Slaight’s Copies, a new sci-fi drama set in an orientation camp for clones of children from well-to-do families. “These clones suffer under an oppressive system in which they are treated like merchandise,” explains YC student Marc Hills, who played a newly hatched clone whose optimism is challenged by the harsh reality of his circumstances. “It was an amazing privilege to explore this new play surrounded by such a wonderful cast.”

Showcase
In late March and early April, the Master of Fine Arts Program class of 2012 traveled to New York and Los Angeles to perform Showcase, the culmination of their three years of training at A.C.T. Each year’s Showcase production exhibits the talents of the graduating class to important industry professionals, agents, and casting directors, helping them make connections that will serve them throughout their acting careers. While A.C.T. is able to provide some support for Showcase, students rely on the generosity of friends, family, and colleagues to help cover the remaining costs. It’s not too late to make a gift supporting the class of 2012. Please visit act-sf.org/showcase for more information.
Alumni Update

A 2006 graduate of the A.C.T. Master of Fine Arts Program, Morgan Spector made his Broadway debut in Arthur Miller’s A View from the Bridge. Originally cast in a bit part, during preview performances, Spector unexpectedly took over the role of Rodolpho—because of his A.C.T. training, he was able to do so “without a glimmer of fear,” remembers director Gregory Mosher. In January, Spector opened off Broadway opposite Janeane Garofalo in the Russian Transport. “Perhaps finest of all is Mr. Spector as the sinister Boris,” the New York Times review reads. “[He] gradually reveals the snarling wolf beneath the genial grin.”

Producers Circle Dinner

In March, guests of A.C.T.’s 2012 Annual Producers Circle Dinner were treated to an elegant onstage dinner and a conversation between Artistic Director Carey Perloff and Michael Krasny, host of KQED’s Forum, about Perloff’s 20 years at A.C.T. “Supporting the theater, meeting the artists, and watching the growth of these fine productions is a priceless experience,” says Producers Circle member and A.C.T. trustee Jo Hurley. “But, at its core, the Producers Circle is about giving—and at A.C.T. you can be assured you get back more than you give!” For information, visit act-sf.org/donate.

She began acting at Berkeley Repertory Theatre in the late ’60s, when it was still on College Avenue. Her first role was Lady Markby in An Ideal Husband, and her most recent appearance was as Anfisa in The Three Sisters. Oliver coproduced Dear Master, by Dorothy Bryant, in 1991, and that production (in which she played George Sand) led to the founding of Aurora Theatre Company, where she was the artistic director until 2004. She has also directed for the A.C.T. Master of Fine Arts Program and UC Berkeley’s Department of Theatre, Dance, and Performance Studies.

ANNE PURCELL’s* (W2) Broadway credits include The Coast of Utopia: Voyage, Shipwreck, and Salvage (Lincoln Center Theater), Dividing the Estate, and Awake and Sing! Off-Broadway credits include Cycling Past the Matterhorn (Theatre Row), Twelfth Night (Fiasco Theater Company), and What May Fall (Fordham Alumni Theatre Company). It was the Great Depression, and times were hard. Then, in 1933, construction began on the Golden Gate Bridge, and people in the Bay Area had something to celebrate. And celebrate they did. Tens of thousands convened on Crissy Field to usher in a new era for the Bay Area.

On February 23, 1933, a golden spade hit the ground, and work began on what would become a beacon of hope, vision, and tenacity for all the world to admire.

Wells Fargo is honored to help bring the celebrations of the Golden Gate Bridge 75th anniversary to life.

Directors Circle members Rob Spikings and Jeffery Perkey share the conviction that theater is essential. “When theater illuminates another’s experiences in a way that is timely and relevant—and in a way that informs people’s views and makes people think—it can be extraordinary,” says Spikings.

Spikings experienced the transformative power of theater firsthand growing up in Minneapolis in a single-parent home. He greatly benefited from local school programs that provided free theater tickets for students from disadvantaged families:

Growing up as a homosexual in the 1960s was not easy, and it made me think that there’s a lot missed by people who aren’t open to diversity—different lands, different cultures, different foods, or different ways of looking at life experiences. Theater affords these opportunities. We are poorer without the arts, across the board, and much richer with them.

Perkey’s love of theater began when he was a second grader in Chicago and played the part of a tooth in a local dentist’s commercial. He went on to receive a theater degree in college and continues as a Minneapolis-based theater practitioner today, assistant directing with The Jungle Theater, Theater Latté Da, and at Guthrie Theater’s Dowling Studio. He has always been involved with theater in some capacity—writing, directing, producing, acting—and recently became involved philanthropically. His first experience supporting A.C.T. was Armistead Maupin’s Tales of the City.

Galvanized by a speech Armistead Maupin gave at The State Theatre in Minneapolis, Spikings and Perkey were thrilled by the idea of a musical based on the author’s famous novels—so much so that they decided to help A.C.T. produce it. “We knew if we wanted to see it, we had to support it. Creating this important new musical was not a trivial feat, and we wanted to be more involved,” explains Spikings. During their June 2011 visit to San Francisco, Spikings and Perkey had the pleasure not only of seeing the show, which they found to be a “great musical experience around Armistead’s words,” but also of attending a Tales-related A.C.T. fundraising dinner with Olympia Dukakis and San Francisco’s Pride Celebration.

Tales was just the beginning of the couple’s joint connection to A.C.T.: despite living in Minneapolis, Spikings and Perkey have found time to take advantage of many Directors Circle benefits.

Most recently they attended the opening night reception for Scorched, a play they were both excited about. Of the experience, they share:

We were excited to see Carey Perloff again and also very happy to meet playwright Wajdi Mouawad and translator Linda Gaboriau. They have created an important play that is so timely, and we are happy that plays such as Wajdi’s are being presented at A.C.T. What a thought-provoking play that brings the audience to another place! New works for the theater are so important to our society, and it is great to see their art presented in such a skilled manner.

While they were in town for Scorched, Spikings and Perkey joined the A.C.T. company for a first-look reading of Dead Metaphor, one of the plays A.C.T. will produce during the 2012–13 season. “We felt privileged to be invited. It was a behind-the-scenes experience that shouldn’t be missed by theater enthusiasts. It’s fun to be involved from the beginning and see all the iterations of a play. Carey’s passion for theater is contagious, and it was a real gift to hear her express her enthusiasm for the work and see how open and candid she is about her play choices. There is a lot more to putting on a play than one would imagine,” says Spikings.

He continues, “In order for theater to survive, we must support artists at all levels. If we don’t support regional theaters, who will?”

AT THE THEATER
The American Conservatory Theater is located at 415 Geary Street. The lobby opens one hour before curtain. Bar service and refreshments are available one hour before curtain. The auditorium opens 30 minutes before curtain.

A.C.T. Merchandise
Copies of Words on Plays, A.C.T.’s in-depth performance guide, are on sale in the main lobby, at the box office, and online.

Refreshments
Full bar service, sweets, and savory items are available one hour before the performance in Fred’s Columbia Room on the lower level and the Sky Bar on the third level. You can avoid the long lines at intermission by preordering food and beverages in the lower- and third-level bars. Bar drinks are now permitted in the auditorium.

Cell Phones!
If you carry a pager, beeper, cell phone, or watch with alarm, please make sure that it is set to the “off” position while you are in the theater. Text messaging during the performance is very disruptive and not allowed.

Perfumes
The chemicals found in perfumes, colognes, and scented after-shave lotions, even in small amounts, can cause severe physical reactions in some individuals. As a courtesy to fellow patrons, please avoid the use of these products when you attend the theater.

Emergency Telephone
Leave your seat location with those who may need to reach you and have them call 415.439.2317 in an emergency.

Latecomers
A.C.T. performances begin on time. Latecomers will be seated before the first intermission only if there is an appropriate interval.

Listening Systems
Headsets designed to provide clear, amplified sound anywhere in the auditorium are available free of charge in the lobby before performances. Please turn off your hearing aid when using an A.C.T. headset, as it will react to the sound system and make a disruptive noise.

Photographs and recordings of A.C.T. performances are strictly forbidden.

Restrooms are located in Fred’s Columbia Room on the lower lobby level, the Balcony Lobby, and the Garret on the uppermost lobby level.

Wheelchair seating is available on all levels of the theater. Please call 415.749.2228 in advance to notify the house staff of any special needs.

A.C.T. is pleased to announce that an Automatic External Defibrillator (AED) is now available on site.

Lost and Found
If you’ve misplaced an item while you’re still at the theater, please look for it at our merchandise stand in the lobby. Any items found by ushers or other patrons will be taken there. If you’ve already left the theater, please call 415.439.2471 and we’ll be happy to check our lost and found for you. Please be prepared with the date you attended the performance and your seat location.
