AMERICAN CONSERVATORY THEATER nurtures the art of live theater through dynamic productions, intensive actor training in its conservatory, and an ongoing dialogue with its community. Under the leadership of Artistic Director Carey Perloff and Managing Director Heather Kitchen, A.C.T. embraces its responsibility to conserve, renew, and reinvent its relationship to the rich theatrical traditions and literatures that are our collective legacy, while exploring new artistic forms and new communities. A commitment to the highest standards informs every aspect of A.C.T.'s creative work.

Founded in 1965 by William Ball, A.C.T. opened its first San Francisco season at the Geary Theater in 1967. In the 1970s, A.C.T. solidified its national and international reputation, winning a Tony Award for outstanding theater performance and training in 1979. During the past three decades, more than 300 A.C.T. productions have been performed to a combined audience of seven million people; today, A.C.T.'s performance, education, and outreach programs annually reach more than 220,000 people in the San Francisco Bay Area. In 1996, A.C.T.'s efforts to develop creative talent for the theater were recognized with the prestigious Jujamcyn Theaters Award.

Since Perloff's appointment in 1992, A.C.T. has enjoyed continued success with groundbreaking productions of classical works and bold explorations of contemporary playwriting. Guided by Perloff and Kitchen, A.C.T. has expanded its audience base and produced challenging theater in the rich context of symposia, audience discussions, and community interaction.

The conservatory, now serving 1,900 students every year, was the first training program not affiliated with a college or university accredited to award a master of fine arts degree. Danny Glover, Annette Bening, Denzel Washington, and Winona Ryder are among the conservatory's distinguished former students. With the 1995 appointment of Melissa Smith as conservatory director, A.C.T. renewed its commitment to excellence in actor training and to the relationship between training, performance, and audience. The A.C.T. Advanced Training Program has moved to the forefront of America's actor training programs, while serving as the creative engine of the company at large.

THE WORKING MAN'S PLAYWRIGHT

by Paul Walsh

"Born in a tenement house, I write about people in tenement houses," Sean O'Casey told the London Observer in November 1925. Juno and the Paycock had just opened at London's Royalty Theatre after its successful premiere the previous year at the Abbey Theatre in Dublin, and O'Casey was being heralded as a new voice on the world stage: the voice of the urban Irish working class. The success of Juno in Dublin and London allowed the 44-year-old O'Casey to give up his job as a day laborer laying brick and devote himself to his writing. "Three weeks before Juno and the Paycock was produced," O'Casey told the London Daily Sketch the following year, "I pawned my trousers for five shillings and earned wages insufficient for the nourishment of a dog."

Born in Dublin in 1880, Sean O'Casey was the youngest of 13 children (eight of whom died in infancy). He was six when his father died. Shortly thereafter, his two eldest brothers joined the British army and his sister married and moved out to start her own home. Faced by sudden and severe poverty, O'Casey's mother moved with her two remaining sons into a two-room flat near the notorious North Dublin tenement quarter that would remain O'Casey's home until he emigrated to London in 1926.

O'Casey suffered as a child from a chronic eye condition that hampered his education and plagued him throughout his life. This, and the fact that his family were Protestants in an almost exclusively Catholic neighborhood, kept him somewhat isolated as a child. At the age of 14 he started work as an errand boy to an ironmonger. He also began to teach himself to read. O'Casey told the London Evening Standard in 1926:

In my life I regret nothing, not even the hardship of manual work by day and the endeavor to keep awake to teach myself to read and write at night. In Dublin there is a blessed institution—a book barrel. When I was young I used to save my two-pences and three-pences, and go down to buy school books....The first serious book I ever bought was a shilling copy of the Globe edition of Shakespeare, and I learnt Hamlet, Macbeth, and Julius Caesar by heart.

His favorite authors included Shakespeare and Dickens, as well as Boucicault, Balzac, Walter Scott, Victor Hugo, and the English Romantics: Byron, Keats, and Shelley.

VISIONS OF A SOCIALIST IRELAND
As he grew older, O'Casey moved through a series of menial jobs until at the age of 19 he secured relatively steady work as a general laborer with the Great Northern Railway of Ireland. As he told Constance Vaughan of the London Daily Sketch in 1926, he spent his time "working, sleeping, eating, drinking, cursing, starving, fighting, courting, going on strike, reading, educating myself in my leisure moments, and learning the Irish language." In 1903 O'Casey joined the nationalist Gaelic League and the St. Laurence O'Toole Hurling and Football Club and Pipers' Band. Two years later he joined the Irish Republican Brotherhood, forerunner of the Irish Republican Army. But O'Casey's nationalist allegiances gave way in 1911 when he met Jim Larkin, the volatile labor leader and founder of the Irish Transport and General Workers' Union. O'Casey became a staunch Larkinite and by the end of the year was out of work, apparently for praising Larkin and his union to his fellow railway workers.

Soon O'Casey was a regular contributor to Larkin's Irish Worker. In August 1913 Larkin organized a strike of Dublin tram workers that led to a six-month lockout that affected nearly a third of Dublin's working people. As the lockout dragged on, O'Casey threw himself into relief activities. He served as secretary of the Union's Citizen Army, formed to protect locked-out workers from violence at the hands of the British authorities and of private armies raised by various Dublin capitalists. A perceived lack of response to the plight continued on page 42
O’CASEY’S IRELAND

by Paul Walsh

“A dramatist, I think, can make a single spot symbolical of the whole world,” Sean O’Casey told the London Daily Graphic in March 1926. “Hardly does it, Chekhov does it, Balzac does it.” And, one can argue, O’Casey does it, as well. It is O’Casey’s ability to bring symbolic universality to his characters and environments that tempts us to forget, 70 years later, the extent to which contemporary political events shaped Juno and the Paycock, just as they shaped the other plays of O’Casey’s Dublin trilogy.

The characters of the trilogy watch as the course of Irish history is rewritten all around them. While, as Seamus Deane has noted, “Politics as [O’Casey] knew it was the occasion of his plays; morality was their subject,” the contemporary events that shaped the modern Irish state are integral to these plays—from the Easter Rising of 1916 (The Plough and the Stars, written in 1926) through the 1920–21 War of Independence (The Shadow of a Gunman, 1923) and the Civil War of 1922–23 (Juno and the Paycock) that followed. The history of O’Casey’s Ireland is a vital part of his dramatic work and of our understanding of the Ireland for whom and of which O’Casey wrote.

THE EASTER RISING

On Easter Monday, 24 April 1916, Dublin woke to the sound of gunfire. One hundred fifty members of the Irish Citizen Army and the Irish Volunteers had marched on and captured the Government Post Office (GPO) in Sackville Street, quickly disarming the minimal military guard on duty on account of the bank holiday. Padraig Pearse, the father of Irish nationalism in the early years of this century, stood in front of the building and read a proclamation declaring the founding of the provisional government of the Republic of Ireland:

Irishmen and Irishwomen: in the name of God and of the dead generations from which she receives her old tradition of nationhood. Ireland, through us, summons her children to her flag and strikes for her freedom.

The brief and bloody Easter Rising and the proclamation of a “sovereign independent Irish state” established by “Irishmen in arms” was the first and most decisive blow of the 20th century for Irish independence from almost 700 years of British colonial rule. The colonial government retaliated forcefully with troops and artillery; hundreds of civilians were killed as downtown Dublin was shelled from the River Liffey by a British gunboat. Throughout the long week, the citizens of Dublin watched the city burn as rebel strongholds fell, one by one, and rebel leaders were arrested and executed.

The Easter Rising was short lived, but its results were profound. The bloody response of the British colonial authorities to the rising galvanized public opinion throughout Ireland around the cause of Irish freedom from British domination. Support for Arthur Griffith’s Irish nationalist party, Sinn Féin (Ourselves Alone), grew enormously. In December 1918, Sinn Féin candidates swept the Irish general elections to the British parliament, but refused to take their seats in... the House of Commons in Westminster. (Thirty-six of the seventy-three newly elected Members of Parliament were in jail for anti-colonial activities.) Instead, they established the Dáil Éireann (Irish Parliament), which declared itself the “government of the Republic established in Easter Week.” Early the following year, Sinn Féin and the Dáil were banned by the British authorities, its meetings raided and its leading members arrested.

THE IRISH WAR OF INDEPENDENCE

Meanwhile, small-scale guerrilla skirmishes against the British colonial presence in Ireland escalated. The Irish Volunteers and Citizen Army that had staged the rising in 1916 had by this time been re-organized as the Irish Republican Army (IRA). Michael Collins, minister for home affairs of the outlawed Dáil Éireann and director of organization of the Volunteers, organized a campaign of ambushes, assassinations, and raids on government arms depots—on one Bloody Sunday, Collins and his hand-picked squad of “12 Apostles” shot between 14 and 19 British secret agents, effectively shutting down the British intelligence network that had been the bane of Irish revolutionaries for centuries. A warning to Irish citizens that collaboration with the British colonial government would be considered an act of treason punishable by death hampered British efforts to enforce the Crown’s rule in Ireland through local recruits to the Royal Irish Constabulary (RIC) and the civil service.

Britain responded by declaring martial law in three southern Irish counties and recruiting a new paramilitary police force of 100,000 heavily armed British exservicemen (and, some say, paroled criminals), who were sent in to make “Ireland a hell for rebels to live in.” The infamous “Black and Tans,” so called because their uniforms were a mix of army khaki and the black of the RIC, wreaked havoc in the countryside. As one historian has written, the Black and Tans roamed through the country by night in their armoured cars bel- lowing with drunken fury in search of vengeance for some successful ambush or captured barracks; set fire to defenceless vil- lages or blew them up with bombs; flogged, tortured, and murdered without ceremony; whenever they could find them, under conditions too loathsome to be particularized; whenever the men were missing they extorted their last penny from the terror of the women, outraged them with drunken obscenities more hateful than their flourished revolvers, and left with a whole generation of Irish children memories of their midnight devilities more horrible than any Dante could imagine for his Inferno (William O’Brien, Irish Revolution).

Between 1917 and 1919 the Black and Tans carried out more than 12,500 raids on private homes. They opened fire at a soccer game in Dublin, killing 12, and, in retaliation for an IRA ambush, burned the town center of the city of Cork.

Such ruthless acts of violence steeled the resolve of the Irish population to press forward against all odds in their fight for indepen- dence from Britain, even as their military strength was waning. Then, suddenly and to everyone’s surprise, the British government relented. A cease fire was ordered and treaty negotiations were opened.

THE TREATY OF 1921

Eamon de Valera, president of the outlawed Dáil Éireann, sent Sinn Féin founder Arthur Griffith and Collins to London to negotiate the treaty that would bring the Irish War of Independence to a close. The issues were made more complex by the long-standing resolve of the partitioned six northern counties of Ireland to maintain their union with the British empire.

The resulting treaty named Ireland a “free state” with the same constitutional status as the Dominions of Canada and New Zealand, the Commonwealth of Australia, and the Union of South Africa, including British military access to Irish ports. Members of the Free State government would have to take an oath of “faith and allegiance” to the English king as members of the British commonwealth. The issue of the six northern counties was left undecided. After three months of intense negotiation and British bullying, Collins finally agreed to sign the treaty, noting: “Think—what have I got for Ireland, something which she has wanted for the last 700 years? Will anyone be satisfied at the bargain? I tell you this—early this morning I signed my own death warrant.”

CIVIL WAR

Conflict over acceptance of the treaty, both inside the Dáil and out, tore Ireland apart. Supporters of the treaty saw it as a judicious first step toward full independence. Opponents saw it as a betrayal of the republican ambitions that had fuelled opposition to British rule in Ireland since the 18th-century rebellion of Wolfe Tone. When the Dáil voted narrowly to accept the treaty, de Valera and his supporters rejected “free state” status and walked out of the assembly, vowing to fight the coming treaty election on the basis of “a call for the Republic and the Republic alone.” Griffith and Collins took over as president and chairman of the provisional government, with the difficult task of maintaining order in the country until a constitution could be written and ratified and a full government put in place. Meanwhile, de Valera and his antitreaty followers declared themselves the true government of Ireland, dutifully elected in 1918. Collins, who had also been elected in 1918, was a member of both governments. The split cut deeply across Irish society, dividing even the volunteers of the IRA, which had grown from 3,000 men armed with hurling sticks to 72,000 armored and trained members by November 1921.

As the old garrisons of the British occupying forces were handed over to the Irish government, skirmishes broke out between factions of the army loyal to Collins and the provisional government (“Free Staters”) and those members of the IRA loyal to de Valera (called “Irregulars” by the government and “Die-hards” in the press).

In April 1922, antitreaty republican troops occupied Dublin’s Four Courts, declaring it the headquarters of the IRA. The British warned Collins that, if he could not control the situation in Ireland, they would have to intervene. After the general elections of June 1922 gave overwhelming support to acceptance of the treaty, the provisional government moved against the republican headquarters at the Four Courts, demanding surrender. When the republicans refused, Collins ordered government troops to bombard the garrison, igniting a civil war that lasted until May of the following year.

In the end, the Free State government was victorious, but many of the greatest leaders of the fight for Irish independence were dead, including Griffith, Collins, and Liam Lynch, commander of the antitreaty faction of the IRA. Partition of the northern counties was confirmed, leaving a gnawing legacy of bitterness and violence that continues to haunt Irish life and politics today. In 1927, Eamon de Valera finally relented and took the “Oath of Allegiance” as a member of the Free State Dáil. In 1932, he won a majority in the Dáil and immediately abolished the “Oath,” leading eventually to international acceptance of the Irish Republic.
RUINS OF GRANDEUR

"I found the poor," wrote an English visitor to Dublin in the years before Sean O'Casey wrote Juno and the Paycock, "among the ruins of grandeur. In one erstwhile drawing room, four families lived, one to each corner, without even sometimes a curtain for partition, under a ceiling of wonderfully modelled and painted figures. . . . No sanitary arrangements, water from a single tap in the backyard or a dark unventilated basement for the use of everybody. Starvation always hovering."

Far from exaggerating the desperate poverty of the Dubliners of his day, O'Casey, in Juno and the Paycock, if anything, underplays it. The Boyles are by no means at the bottom of the barrel.

In its more fanciful moments, Dublin in the early years of this century liked to think of itself as the Second City of the Empire, but it was in fact the Empire's festering sore. In the north of the city where O'Casey and his creations lived, the death rate from disease, at 28%, was higher than Calcutta's, due mainly to rampant tuberculosis. The housing conditions were, without exaggeration, the worst in Europe: 20,000 families lived in one-room apartments, and a large proportion of the tenements had been condemned officially as unfit for human habitation. They were damp, overcrowded and often Theater in Progress at A.C.T.

This winter is a busy time for the artistic department at A.C.T., as the company hosts playwrights, directors, and actors developing projects under consideration for upcoming A.C.T. seasons.

Playwright Robert O'Hara spent two weeks at A.C.T. in November working with members of the Hecuba cast and A.C.T. Advanced Training Program students on -14: An American Mau, the third installment in the trilogy that includes last season's Insurrection: Holding History. O'Hara was selected last year by the NEA/TCG Theatre Residency Program for Playwrights to receive funding for a year-long residency at A.C.T. A similar grant awarded to A.C.T. in 1994 supported a two-year residency for Obie Award-winning playwright Mac Wellman. Wellman and composer David Lang (Hecuba, Mary Stuart, The Tempest) are currently collaborating on a music/theater adaptation of an Ambrose Bierce story, The Difficulty of Crossing a Field, which was also workshopped at A.C.T. in November. (A public workshop presentation with the renowned Kronos Quartet is planned for April 1999 in the Forum space of the Center for the Arts at Yerba Buena Gardens.)

On November 20, Academy Award-winning actress Olympia Dukakis and Hecuba costar Michele Shay led an in-house reading of Tennessee Williams' 1963 drama The Milk Train Doesn't Stop Here Any More. During the week of December 7, Advanced Training Program students presented in-house cabaret performances of selections from Michael Feingold's translation/adaptation of Kurt Weill and Bertolt Brecht's masterpiece, The Threepenny Opera (Feingold also translated last season's Mary Stuart).

January is an even busier time for theatrical invention and reinvention at A.C.T., with workshops and readings scheduled throughout the month, including: a new adaptation by Larry Carpenter of Karl Zuckmayer's Captain of Köpenick with professional actors and students; Giles Havergal's adaptation of Edith Wharton's classic novel The House of Mirth; A.C.T. Resident Dramaturg Paul Walsh, visiting director David Eshjornsen, and National Public Radio commentator and playwright Kevin Kling's coadaptation of Ibsen's Peer Gynt; and Bay Area playwright Octavio Solis's powerful new play Bethlehem, which was recently selected by the prestigious Rockefeller Foundation for a generous development grant.

In February, students in the A.C.T. Young Conservatory’s Performance Workshop will develop a newly commissioned play by Constance Congdon, who will be in residence in the YC's acclaimed New Plays Program.

New plays and new translations and/or adaptations of classics make up an increasing number of the works produced at A.C.T. each season. Workshops and readings give A.C.T. artists, staff, and students invaluable opportunities to explore works at various stages of the development process.

VIEWS OF IRELAND

In October, A.C.T. subscribers and theater enthusiasts explored the beauty and literary lore of the Fair Isle during A.C.T.'s popular ten-day Ireland Theater Tour. The group of 45, led by A.C.T. Manager of Individual Giving Michele Casau and Resident Dramaturg Paul Walsh, travelled along Ireland's west coast and across the midlands to Dublin—a city that has nurtured playwrights and poets for centuries—for three performances at the world-renowned Dublin Theatre Festival. Casau shares with us her photos and memories of this enchanting journey to the heart of the Irish theater:

"Here we are near Sligo, in Yeats country, at an old pagan spring that had been converted into a Christian shrine. Fran Goldman is reading Yeats's poetry to us...a highlight of the trip."

"The final night. We dined at one of Dublin's oldest restaurants, then went on to a performance of the new play Native City by Paul Mercier. We hated to leave!"

"We gathered in front of the Arlington Hotel in Dublin before setting out for an exciting day touring the city's sights and taking in a performance of Marina Carr's By the Bog O'Cat's at the Abbey Theatre (where Juno and the Paycock premiered in 1924)." A.C.T. AND THE ASIAN ART MUSEUM JOIN FORCES

A.C.T. Artistic Director Carey Perloff and other A.C.T. artists are working closely with the Asian Art Museum of San Francisco—which boasts an extensive collection of miniatures and other exquisite artwork from India—to prepare for the American premiere of Tom Stoppard’s Indian Ink at the Geary Theater in February. The museum and A.C.T. are also collaborating in ongoing efforts to attract members of the Bay Area theatrical and visual arts communities to upcoming offerings at both organizations.

On January 13, as Indian Ink begins rehearsals at A.C.T., the exhibition “Chinese Jade from the Permanent Collection” will go on view at the Asian Art Museum. The museum’s comprehensive exhibition will explore the technical aspects of jade production and the Chinese love for the material from the Neolithic period through the 20th century. Approximately 200 jades—selected from more than 1,500 pieces in the Avery Brundage Collection—will be displayed.

On the fundraising front, thanks to the success of last season’s benefit hosted by the Asian Art Museum and A.C.T. for Golden Child, plans are currently underway for another “Jade Circle” event during the run of Indian Ink. Look for updates in next month’s issue of Stagebill and in Preview, A.C.T.’s subscriber newsletter.

The Asian Art Museum of San Francisco is located in Golden Gate Park. Please call (415) 379-8800 for hours and exhibition information, or check out the museum’s Web site at http://www.asianart.org.

The Working Man's Playwright, continued from page 13 of the locked-out workers from Irish nationalist organizations precipitated O'Casey's break with the nationalist movement, whose goals he began to see as incompatible with his own vision of a socialist Ireland.

When the strike was finally lost, the situation became more complex. Larkin went to America to raise support for the Irish Trades Union and was imprisoned for subversive activities. The Scottish socialist republican James Connolly took his place as head of the Trades Union movement in Ireland, forging a link between Irish nationalists and workers. O'Casey pointed out that employers who had locked out workers during the tram strike were now being recruited into the Citizen Army and resigned from the labor organization in protest over what he saw as the union’s betrayal of the laboring class in favor of what O'Casey called a middle-class platform of cultural and political nationalism.

Two years later Connolly joined the leaders of the Easter Rising as military commander of the republican forces in Dublin and was one of those executed by the government for his part in the rebellion. O'Casey took no part in the Easter Rising or the events that followed. Disenchanted with nationalist politics, he turned to writing in his spare time while continuing to work as a general laborer.

“LIFE IS THE PRIMARY FACT”

O'Casey wrote his first play in 1911 for the Drama Club attached to the National Movement, but it was after 1916 that he became passionately involved in writing for the stage. “I started [playwriting] by accident,” he said, “We used to act and produce plays. Awful plays. So one day I said: I'll write you a play worth acting.”

In 1919, O'Casey submitted two of these “accidental” works for consideration to the Abbey Theatre. The plays were rejected, albeit with kind and encouraging words (and O'Casey promptly burned the manuscripts). After two further rejections, O'Casey submitted a play about the Anglo-Irish War (1919–21) entitled On the Run. It was immediately accepted and produced at the Abbey in 1923 with the title The Shadow of a Gunman, Juno and the Paycock, which takes place during the Irish Civil War (1921–23), opened at the Abbey in March 1924 and became the first play ever to run at that theater for more than a week.

O'Casey's third great Dublin play, The Plough and the Stars, which takes place during the Easter Rising of 1916, opened at the Abbey in February 1926. Three days later the play was met by organized demonstrations of Irish nationalists who felt that the play was insufficiently reverential toward the revolutionary leaders of 1916 who had fought for freedom for Ireland from British rule. The stage was stormed, speeches of protest made, and the crowd harangued (by poet/theater manager W. B. Yeats, who had founded the Abbey in 1899 with the noted Irish author Lady Gregory). Thereafter the play was performed with policemen lining the walls of the auditorium.

With some bitterness, O'Casey left Dublin for London in March 1926, where Juno was due to transfer from the Royalty to the Fortune Theatre. In London he married a young Dublin actress, Eileen Carey, in September 1927, and from there he submitted his next play, The Silver Tassie (1928), to the Abbey, which refused to produce it.

The Abbey's rejection of The Silver Tassie led to a bitter dispute and a breach between O'Casey and Lady Gregory, whom he was never to see again. From his self-imposed exile in London, O'Casey continued to write, experimenting with new themes and new forms. He wrote 17 plays in all, six volumes of autobiography (1939–54), and two books of criticism, and engaged in a voluminous and often heated correspondence.

O'Casey, the often venomous critic of capitalist society and organized religion, the revolutionary communist whose failing eyesight blinded him even to the worst excesses of Stalin, is remembered today as a man of great compassion: “There must be blood in all things that are written, in all pictures that are painted, in all songs that are sung.” O'Casey said in a Daily Sketch interview in 1926. “There must be the cry of humanity; it may be a ferocious cry, a bitter cry; but if it isn’t a human cry it isn’t Art. For life is the primary fact.”
needed to be buttressed against collapse. Because they were also the high-ceilinged, grandiose town houses of an aristocracy which had now fled to London, they were too expensive for the poor to heat properly, and so, in winter, they were bitterly cold. Above the second floor of the tenements, the Gas Company refused to fit pipes, so the fireplace was also used for cooking—meat perhaps once a week, the rest of the time "bread and tea for breakfast, potatoes sometimes with cabbage for lunch, bread and tea for supper."...

Juno and the Paycock is sometimes seen as a pacifist play, but in fact it is more a condemnation of the wrong kind of violence in the wrong cause, setting the sufferings inflicted in the name of peripheral change against the dreadful continuity of poverty. O’Casey’s people, far from being passive, are engaged in a frantic and relentless struggle with economic necessity. The guiding spirit of this play is Joxer; alert, constantly weaving and dodging in his efforts to ingratiate himself and get some food or drink, watchful for every opportunity and owing no loyalty other than to his stomach. While the banners wave and the bullets fly, starvation hovers.

O’CASEY ON JUNO AND THE PAYCOCK

In the play the impact of the calamitous Civil War in Ireland is shown on two worker families, on two mothers each of whom has lost a son; and, if there be a message in the play, I imagine it to be that a Civil War should be waged only for a deep and great cause, like the overthrow of the paid without representation that evoked the American War of Independence, the overthrow of feudalism as in the French Revolution, and the establishment of political and economic rule and ownership by the people as in the October Revolution of the Soviets. We should, however, be careful of well-meaning idealism; good as it may be and well-meaning, its flame in a few hearts may not give new life and new hope to the many, but dwindle into gashly and futile funeral pyres in which many are uselessly destroyed and enormous damage done to all.

—Sean O’Casey

THE FIRST JUNO
The dress-rehearsal of Juno and the Paycock would be held at 5 p.m. on the Sunday.

I arrived at the theatre at 4:30 p.m. and found the author there before me looking rather glum and wondering if a rehearsal would take place since so far as he could find out there was no one else in the theatre. I assured him that everything would be all right even though he privately thought otherwise. Sara Allgood, who had spent the night talking with song and story, had left the theatre around 3 a.m. a very tired woman. I tried to persuade Sean that dress-rehearsals were always like this but he was only half-convinced. Although I did not know it at the time he was suffering much pain with his eyes and was attending the Royal Eye and Ear Hospital where he was a patient of the senior surgeon, the sensitive and perceptive Mr. Joe Cummins, who took a particular interest in the dramatist and in the theatre.

Gradually the players filed in and quietly went to their dressing rooms. . . . Yeats, Lady Gregory, and Robinson took seats in the stalls. The author sat a few seats away from them. The curtain rose about 5:36 p.m. So far as I could see and hear while waiting for my cue in the wings the rehearsal seemed to proceed smoothly. As soon as I had finished my part of Bentham at the end of the second act I went down into the stalls and sat two seats behind the author. Here for the first time I had the opportunity of seeing something of the play from an objective point of view. I was stunned by the tragic quality of the third act which the magnificent playing of Sara Allgood made almost unbearable. But it was the blistering irony of the final scene which convinced me that this man sitting two seats in front of me was a dramatist of genius, one destined to be spoken of far beyond the confines of the Abbey Theatre.

Afterwards, I sat there stunned. So, indeed, so far as I could see, did Robinson, Yeats, and Lady Gregory. Then Yeats ventured an opinion. He said that the play, particularly in its final scene, reminded him of a Dostoievsky novel. Lady Gregory turned to him and said: “You know, Willie, you never read a novel by Dostoievsky.” And she promised to amend this deficiency by sending him a copy of The Idiot. I turned to O’Casey and found I could only say to him: “Magnificent, Sean. Magnificent.” Then we all went quietly home.
