A SWEET STORY

In Our Town, the role of the Stage Manager has many duties, not the least of which is the drawing of strawberry sodas for high school sweethearts George and Emily. Peter Donat, who dons cap and apron to play a soda jerk in a scene from Thornton Wilder’s landmark drama, pantomimes the action with amazing accuracy. But where did he learn the rudiments of this lost art?

At 24th and York Streets, home of the St. Francis Candy Store. Donat and cast members Scot Bishop and Annette Benning, along with directors Janice Hutchins and William Ball, traveled to the Mission District shop to prepare for their roles in Our Town and bask in nostalgia. For Donat, it was also an opportunity to pick up a few pointers. Owner Chris Christie has operated his authentic soda fountain and sweet shop for almost as long as Our Town has been performed—since 1940. (The store itself was built in 1918.) Does Donat’s skill at concocting bubbly confections equal that of veteran counterman Christie’s? You’ll have to visit the St. Francis to judge for yourself!

SPRING PLAYS PROLOGUED

This season’s final two Prologues are scheduled for Monday, April 8, when director Janice Hutchins will discuss Painting Churches, and Monday, May 6, when William Ball offers commentary on Mass Appeal. Both are at 5:30 p.m. at the Geary Theatre. Seating for these lively discussions is unreserved and free of charge. All are welcome.

The visitors witnessed what for many students represents their best chance to break into the business.

The American Conservatory Theater, burdened by a $1.5 million deficit and extensive media scrutiny of its finances, has received a clean bill of health from the state Attorney General’s office, the Chronicle learned yesterday.

“We found nothing improper,” said deputy attorney general Joanne Condas, after concluding an informal inquiry.

“The whole thing was a tempest in a teapot,” said Condas. “The investigation was prompted by charges in the media of financial mismanagement at ACT. I think we were had by the media.”

Condas, who monitors nonprofit organizations for the state’s Registry of Charitable Trusts, said she spent “a good deal of my time over the past several weeks” going over ACT’s financial records with a Registry auditor, both at the Registry office in Sacramento and at ACT’s offices on Geary Street. She also interviewed ACT general director William Ball.

“Conchas declined to list specific areas of inquiry, saying only, “Our policy is not to disclose the details of such an investigation.”

The informal inquiry was begun last month following stories in the San Francisco Examiner that reported on ACT’s finances.

Among the issues raised by the Examiner in recent weeks was Ball’s reported investment of a $450,000 Ford Foundation grant in gold bullion for an administrative pension plan.

Questions were also raised about Ball’s rejection of a $1 million cash gift to the theater company. Ball turned down the donation, offered specifically to help pay off ACT’s mortgage on the Geary Theater, because he wouldn’t comply with the donor’s stipulation that the prorata remaining monies be returned if ACT ever left San Francisco. ACT’s rising administrative expenses also have come under scrutiny.

ACT has consistently refused to comment on these issues, and yesterday, ACT spokesman Dennis Powers said “no comment” on the attorney general’s findings.

At the beginning of the ACT season in October, an article in the Chronicle Sunday Datebook detailed the company’s growing deficit and fund-raising difficulties.

Tempting declarations all, but closer examination reveals a truer story: the deliberate rise of an irresistible talent which, nurtured by A.C.T.'s multidimensional theatre experience, flowered not a moment too soon, not a moment too late.

While Hutchins, who directs the final three shows of the current repertory season, may seem to have taken her place as one of A.C.T.'s most radiant stars overnight, the truth of the matter is a bit more involved. Hutchins began her work with A.C.T. ten years ago as an actress and teacher. Over the years she has trained as a director under such respected masters as William Ball, Allen Fletcher, Nagle Jackson and Tom Moore and served an invaluable apprenticeship staging many student projects and Plays-in-Proess works. With recent successes at several other Bay Area theatres to her credit, Hutchins this month makes her Geary Theatre debut with Painting Churches, featuring Barbara Dirickson, William Paterson and Marrian Watters.

But Painting Churches is not the only show with which Hutchins is now represented at A.C.T. Continuing a collaboration with William Ball that began three years ago at the Sunnyvale Summer Repertory Theatre, Hutchins shares co-directing responsibility with A.C.T.'s General Director on the currently playing American classic Our Town and on Miss Appell, the story of a brash seminarian's challenge to a conservative parish priest which opens at the Geary Theatre on May 7.

Painting Churches, Hutchins' first solo directing effort to be seen on A.C.T.'s mainstage, is a small jewel of a play, rich in emotional resonance. In this recent work by Tina Howe, a young, liberated artist who is experiencing the first blush of success returns to her ancestral Boston Beacon Hill home to paint a portrait of her parents.

To Hutchins, "It is a story of flowering and decay. The cycle of life is both beginning and ending. Painting Churches opens on a time of transition, but doesn't develop in the typically linear fashion of, say, Our Town. Nor is it revealed in episodes, like Miss Appell. It is impressionistic, presenting a variety of perspectives. "Howe paints her play like a landscape," says Hutchins. "There is little exposition in the first act. It is like a tapestry. It leaves you with a sense of 'Oh, I see . . .'. In Miss Appell, however, it's clear what is at stake at all times. The conflict is posed very early on, leaving the question in the viewer's mind, 'How will this end, how will it be resolved?' Even more directly, Our Town has a character, the Stage Manager, come forward and tell the audience who wrote the play and what's going to happen. Now that's exposition!"

Hutchins developed her own system to manage the extraordinary workload that for several weeks had her simultaneously rehearsing three plays and that required her to make innumerable artistic decisions every day. As far back as last October, when she received her directing assignments, she read and re-read the plays she would be staging. During her assiduous study of the scripts, she kept a journal of her thoughts and feelings. "One never knows," she explains, "where those initial, intuitive reactions may later prove useful."

A thorough understanding of each character in the three plays grew out of Hutchins' stream-of-consciousness journal entries. Armed with this insight and her "director's score"—a binder containing her script and all the notes she had taken on the play—she met with her designers to develop the physical world of each play. This work under way, Hutchins was at last ready to begin actual rehearsals.

Because of the demands placed on A.C.T.'s acting company by the theatre's revolving repertory performance schedule, Painting Churches had a protracted ten-week rehearsal period, nearly double that usually given shows. The cast came to call the expanded time-frame "Russian Rehearsals" after the practice made famous by Konstantin Stanislavski and the Moscow Art Theatre of developing plays over long and intensive periods. But a long rehearsal period, advantageous in many respects, also poses unusual challenges.

"One challenge we faced," Hutchins observes, "was the possibility of peaking too early. Another was the danger of rehearsal burn-out which is especially great with a small cast play. Fortunately, I was working with three real pros. Barbara, Bill and Marrian have all worked together before and did a great job of pacing themselves."

In fact, the Dirickson-Paterson-Walters team has previously played together many times. The Matchmaker, Man and Superman, The Circle, All the Way Home, Hay Fever, Buried Child and Uncle Vanya are only some of the A.C.T. shows that have featured the popular trio. This month audiences will have the pleasure of seeing them together again, this time under the guidance of Janice Hutchins, A.C.T.'s newest—and busiest—director.

THE WAYS OF HOWE

An Interview with Tina Howe

by Jeffrey Hirsch

Sarah Lawrence College. She wrote her first play there and saw it successfully directed by classmate (and now noted actress) Jane Alexander. Other plays followed, each more ambitious than the last. Moss is seen in the gallery of a "major American museum of modern art" and demands a cast of forty-four. The Art of Dining (1979) requires only nine actors to perform but calls for enormous quantities of food to be elaborately prepared and consumed onstage.

Painting Churches, Howe's most recent play, though less demanding in terms of its casting and staging requirements, is perhaps the playwright's most emotionally complex work to date. Her fifth play to be seen in New York, it premiered at the Second Stage in 1983. The production transferred to the Lamb's Theatre Off-Broadway the following year and earned Howe an Obie Award for distinguished Playwriting and the Rosamund Ryder Award for Outstanding Creative Achievement in the Theatre.

We recently spoke by telephone with Tina Howe at the New York home she shares with her husband, novelist Norman Levy, and their two children, Eben, a seventeen year old musician, and Darla, an fourteen year old aspiring actress. At the center of this artistic whirlwind, not unlike the one in which she was raised, Howe writes on an old manual typewriter at the family dining room table. She is currently at work on a screenplay about which she declined to comment. ("I've sort of been told not to talk about it.") She was otherwise quite candid in her conversation and more than a little charming.

A.C.T.: What are you finding to be the differences between writing for the stage and writing for film?

TINA HOWE: The main difference is that in the theatre I've never written more than nine scenes to comprise a whole piece. Now, all of a sudden, I'm having to write 200 scenes. It's like playing with a huge carton full of marbles where before I just had a large platter full. The craft involved in screenwriting is phenomenal. It's very seductive to write all kinds of fancy visual things. I'm finding myself imagining all these great visual jokes and totally forgetting about plot. It requires a lot of discipline to stay on track.

A.C.T.: Do stage pictures come to you when you're writing a play?

T.H.: Very much so. I always start with an image of the setting. To me, it's everything. That's where I always begin, with the possibility that any given setting offers for visual firework.

A.C.T.: Did you have a particular image in mind when you began writing Painting Churches?

T.H.: Painting Churches took me a long time to write. I knew from the start that I wanted those parents in it and that I wanted it to be about a child trying to come of age artistically within a super-talented family in which she was, greatly outshone. But for a long time I tried to make the daughter musical. I had a pernicious notion that it would be interesting to create a nonverbal character. So for three years I struggled to see if I could pull it off. The story was that Mags was a pianist preparing for her debut. Whenever the going got rough in the living room, she would go to the piano and express herself at the keyboard. It just didn't work because I found it impossible to make her as interesting as the people who speak.

I finally abandoned the idea of making her musical and then I had to find another art form for her. I didn't want her to be a writer because it's very hard to dramatize what a writer goes through. When I got the idea that she should be a portrait painter, I knew I had what I needed. The trick of painting a portrait is getting the subject to pose. The dramatic dilemma created when Mags asks her parents to hold still so that she can paint them provided me with an open field for chaos. Once I got that device, I finished the play in eight months.

A.C.T.: Do you recall your first experiences of looking at art?

T.H.: It's always been very much a part of my life. I grew up in Manhattan, three blocks away from the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Back in those days, admission was free and the museum was where I would go to play on rainy days. It was like a funhouse to me. The main floor has all of that great stuff: the armor, the Egyptian tombs and Roman tubs, the statues without any heads.
Like Mags, the prodigal daughter in Painting Churches, Tina Howe comes from a grand old New England family. Both sets of her grandparents were of Boston Brahmin stock and as aristocratic in their achievements as in their ancestry. Howe's paternal grandfather, Mark Antony DeWolfe Howe, was the author of over fifty books, a celebrated poet, critic and Pulitzer Prize winning biographer. Uncle Mark DeWolfe Howe was an eminent Harvard Law School professor, and Aunt Helen wrote popular novels in the thirties and forties. Tina Howe's father, Quincy, was a broadcast journalist who distinguished himself as a radio and television commentator, teacher and author. And Howe's mother, a grande dame of legendary eccentricity, dabbled at watercolor painting.

Howe began to eke out her own place in the family pantheon while studying at Sarah Lawrence College. She wrote her first play there and saw it successfully directed by classmate (and now noted actress) Jane Alexander. Other plays followed, each more ambitious than the last. Mourn (1979) is set in the gallery of a "major American museum of modern art" and demands a cast of forty-four. The Art of Dining (1979) requires only nine actors to perform but calls for enormous quantities of food to be elaborately prepared and consumed onstage.

Painting Churches, Howe's most recent play, though less demanding in terms of its casting and staging requirements, is perhaps the playwright's most emotionally complex work to date. Her fifth play to be seen in New York, it premiered at the Second Stage in 1983. The production transferred to the Lamb's Theatre Off-Broadway the following year and earned Howe an Obie Award for Distinguished Playwriting and the Rosamond Rider Award for Outstanding Creative Achievement in the Theatre.

We recently spoke by telephone with Tina Howe at the New York home she shares with her husband, novelist Norm-man Levy, and their two children, Eben, a seventeen year old musician, and Dara, a fourteen year old aspiring actress. At the center of this artistic whirlwind, not unlike the one in which she was raised, Howe writes on an old manual typewriter at the family dining room table. She is currently at work on a screenplay about which she declined to comment. "(I've sort of been told not to talk about it.) She was otherwise quite candid in her conversation and more than a little charming.

And my mother was herself a painter, a watercolorist. She had a very whimsical eye and was always making tromp l'oeil artifacts and leaving them around the house. So I grew up in a kind of crazy quilt environment full of my mother's objects and paintings.

A.C.T.: Who are your favorite painters?

T.H.: When I was a little girl, I loved the Renaissance painters, Botticelli and Fra Angelico. Then in college I went through a ferocious surrealist stage. Now I like the French Impressionists most. And I like to go to current shows of new artists. I go to the galleries a lot and see the new work that's being done. I'd have to say that my taste keeps changing.

Joseph Cornell, though, is an artist who I remain passionate about. The first time I saw a show of his shadowboxes, well I had a fever anyway, but I practically had to be carried out of the gallery. His pieces are like tiny stage sets. What strikes me about them more than anything is that they all seem to have been inhabited at one time. I can always hear dying footsteps and ticking clocks and beating of birds' wings when I look at Cornell boxes. They seem so alive.

A.C.T.: What do you think comprises a great portrait?

T.H.: It must evoke the style and the personality and the aura of the subject. It can't simply be a likeness. A great portrait captures something that is ineffable and larger than life.

A.C.T.: Did you have one particular Renoir painting in mind as you wrote the final scene of Painting Churches?

T.H.: I didn't want to fasten the final image of the play onto one particular painting so I made it a composite of many of Renoir's outdoor cafe scenes. I kept embroidering the image in my mind as Fanny and Gardner do. They start to imagine Japanese lanterns and an orchestra and lights twinkling in the trees and the image becomes denser and denser in their minds' eye. There is no single Renoir painting.

A.C.T.: What is depicted in that imaginary painting?

T.H.: It's the last dance. The last dance under a starry sky. It's magical and it's not quite real in just the way of those Renoir paintings of dancing couples. And it's clear in the picture that life is never going to be this wonderful for these people again. The moment is beautiful but it is laced with sadness.

A.C.T.: Would you say that you write in an Impressionistic style?

T.H.: Yes, absolutely. People tell me that I'm a "feminine" writer. I ask, "What does that mean?" and they say, "Oh, your writing is circular and associative." I don't know what those descriptions mean or if they're even important. But I know that I

Its looks raise your expectations. Its luxury and technology fulfill them.

You're prepared to be treated superbly inside a Continental, and you're not disappointed. This car is a prime example of how high technology can heighten the levels of automotive luxury, as well as your sense of security. For instance, the Givenchy model shown here, like all V8 powered Designer Series Continentals, is equipped with an Anti-Lock Brake System. This advanced brake technology, offered only by Lincoln among domestic carmakers, was designed to prevent wheel lock-up during braking. This helps the driver maintain lateral stability and steering control in emergency stops as well as providing, generally, shorter stopping distances.

Further, the civilizing effect of Continental's high technology is very apparent in the ride provided by its electronically controlled air suspension. And in the smoothness and responsiveness of its computer-monitored V8 engine.

try to illuminate my subjects through inference. As I structure a piece, I try to stay as open as possible to nuance and suggestion.

When I write, I listen to Glenn Gould's Bach recordings which are really performed in a pitch of ecstasy. I drink a lot of soda and chew several pieces of Juicy Fruit gum. So I'm all sugared up and I've got Glenn Gould going at the partitas or the Well-Tempered Clavier and I'm up around the ceiling, flying. That's the state I try to write in, with images and impulses coming really fast.

A.C.T.: In the introduction to the published collection of your plays, you speak of the act of writing as being possessed of certain mysterious qualities and you call the process of playwriting "the art of suggestion." How is it so?

T.H.: Playwriting requires you to evoke everything. Once you have a character say straight out how he feels or what he wants, you're doomed. That just isn't the way people behave. In life, everything tends to be buried; we never quite say what we mean. As a playwright, you have to know where you want your characters to go, but the characters have to be the last ones let in on the secret of where they're headed.

A.C.T.: With which playwrights do you feel the greatest affinity?

T.H.: Beckett, Pirandello and Ionesco. I've always loved the absurdists, they just carry you out of the theatre into another dimension. They're sort of out of favor at the moment, but my heart is really with writers who take you off the canvas completely.

A.C.T.: Is Painting Churches autobiographical or more a work of the imagination?

T.H.: Largely a work of the imagination. It's all true but none of it really happened. My father was not a poet and he never became senile. I didn't grow up in Boston nor have I ever been a painter. My mother was actually much wilder and even more eccentric than Fanny. I think that in writing the play I was fulfilling a fantasy. I was trying to phrase—or rephrase—my own attempts to be recognized by my parents.

A.C.T.: Then the theme of a child seeking her parents' acceptance and approval is something you consciously set out to develop?

T.H.: Yes, that was very real. My parents had such a tremendous influence on me that I felt I couldn't be able to progress as a writer until I'd put them into some kind of artistic perspective. I'm one of those people who, though I have teenage children of my own, still talk about my mother and father as if I were nineteen years old. It's sick! A grown woman isn't supposed to do that! But they still tug, and pull at me. And I knew that until I had come to terms with them in my writing I would never be able to climb out of my artistic adolescence.

A.C.T.: Was it a successful effort?

T.H.: I think so. I was able to give us all a much happier ending than we really had. That was wonderful, particularly being able to rewrite my parents' history. As you know, most old couples don't walk off into the twilight. Actually, my mother died first and left my father quite bewildered. He became very ill and his death was horrifying as is that of any parent. I wanted to write Painting Churches to give them both a different ending.

A.C.T.: What is it about old Boston families like the Churches that makes them such appealing literary subjects?

T.H.: They're a dying breed. I didn't grow up in Boston but I did go back there to visit grandparents on both sides of the family. I still stay in touch with a few of my parents' old friends and there are a couple of relatives who are still hanging on. But most members of my generation, as have I, married out of that group. Most of us consciously married not only non-Bostonians but non-Wasp's altogether. Part of Gardner and Fanny's charm is that they are a vanishing breed. Families like the Churches really don’t exist anymore. Oh, there may be some remnants left somewhere, but most of the sons and daughters of those families left home and married out of the fold, thank God!

A.C.T.: What qualities of that Beacon Hill world characterize it for you?

T.H.: The password I grew up with was “plain living and high thinking.” New Englanders like Fanny and Gardiner are more concerned with ideas than they are with money. Ideas and letters matter tremendously to them. Gardiner’s world is the world of the imagination and of great poetry and Fanny, too, has a fanciful imagination. Even though they’re part of a grand old family they aren’t that concerned with money.

A.C.T.: Is that why you cast Gardiner as a poet and have him reciting verse throughout the play?

T.H.: In my imagination, I conceived Gardiner to be a cross between Robert Frost and Robert Lowell. He would of course love all the poets he recites from. When I was growing up, both my parents read aloud all the time. My father was one of those people who memorize a lot of poetry. All of a sudden in the middle of dinner he would start reciting a Yeats or Keats or e. cummings poem. It was very much in the household.

A.C.T.: Why did you choose Chopin for incidental music in the play?

T.H.: My mother’s mother was a wonderful musician. She was a pianist; in fact I inherited her piano. She was a great Chopin player. As a little girl I remember spending hours sitting in the parlor listening to her play Chopin polonaises and waltzes. I guess that when I began writing about Boston, my grandmother’s old Chopin Waltzes floated back into my mind. When you hear them, you’ll see that they are perfect for the play. They’re so wistful. Again, it’s the dying footfall, the lost romance.

A.C.T.: Is it more difficult to write comedy or drama?

T.H.: They’re interchangeable to me. I don’t know the difference.

A.C.T.: What makes you laugh?

T.H.: I have a very low level sense of humor. Sight gags make me laugh. People walking into doors, people slipping on banana peels, that sort of thing. Anything having to do with food I also find hilarious. I don’t know why, I just find food hysterically funny.

A.C.T.: What is your relationship to Painting Churches, now, two years after you wrote it?

T.H.: I’ve said good-bye to it certainly. It’s being done all over the place and I find that very gratifying. Theaters ask if I’ll come out and see it and I tend not to want to do that simply because I’ve already had the experience of watching the play come to life. I think it’s very dangerous to hold on to old work. And it’s so easy to do. I got a lot out of Painting Churches. I learned a lot about my own gifts and drawbacks as a writer. But now I’m very restless and moving on to new areas.

A.C.T.: What’s next?

T.H.: Most writers start with the family and then they take on more far-reaching subject matter. I did it the other way around, starting with much vaster canvases in Museum and The Art of Dining and then shrinking back to end up in the living room with Painting Churches. It was probably inevitable; every writer has to touch down there sooner or later. But I plan to make a fast retreat from the living room! My next play is going to take place in the most opposite setting you can imagine. I’m going back to working on larger canvases and I hope that as I get older, I’ll become more and more courageous. Maybe if I play my Glenn Gould records loud enough and chew enough gum I’ll just zoom off into another stratosphere altogether!

WILDER'S WORLD

by Jeffrey Hirsch

There is little that need be said about Our Town. Acclaimed a modern masterpiece at the time of its first production in 1938, anthologized in hundreds of drama collections, translated into more than thirty languages, and performed on stages around the world continuously for almost half a century, the play has always spoken very well for itself, forthrightly and in a familiar voice. With folksy appeal and an earnest belief in the dignity of the smallest events in daily life, it portrays an America younger and more innocent than our own but does so with such honesty and homely wisdom as to render the picture it presents undiminished by time. At Our Town's heart is an artful ability to recapture lost time and show the human souls it portrays to be part of a never-ending, universal cycle; to juxtapose, in no less a context than that of eternity, the life of a New Hampshire village against the life of the stars in the heavens.

Although Our Town stands hardly on its own, to its author attention should be paid. Thornton Wilder was, in his lifetime, among America's leading men of letters. At the height of his fame, in the thirties and forties, he was ranked in importance with Hemingway and Fitzgerald, who were then a couple of his best pals. In his world travels, he had audiences with Popes at the Vatican, dined in Vienna with Sigmund Freud and in London with Bernard Shaw, and when in France, lodged at the villa of Gertrude Stein and Alice B. Toklas. He appeared on the cover of Time magazine, was called upon to write a movie for Hitchcock (Shadow of a Doubt) and collaborated with composer Paul Hindemith on an operatic version of his play The Long Christmas Dinner. His books sold well enough to provide princely support and also earned him, along with an international reputation, three Pulitzer Prizes. The only other writer ever to be similarly thrice honored was Eugene O'Neill, recognized in all instances, of course, for his playwrighting. Wilder—and here is a measure of the position he held in the literary community—was not only an award-winning dramatist but a Pulitzer Prize novelist as well.

Thornton Niven Wilder was born in Madison, Wisconsin, on April 17, 1897, the surviving member of a set of twin boys. He was named for his mother, the former Isabella Thornton Wilder, a Presbyterian minister's daughter. Thornton's father Amos was a Congregationalist with a Ph.D. in economics from Yale and at the time of his son's birth was editor of the local newspaper. Amos Wilder embraced the firm Calvinist attitudes of his New England ancestors and was harshly authoritarian in dealings with his children. He was ever fearful for his brood's spiritual safety and let no opportunity go by at which he might lecture his two sons and three daughters on how to defend themselves against a world full of temptation. He carefully planned each of the children's futures but from the start held out little hope for Thornton's success. The elder Wilder's disapproving nature strongly influenced his son, who strove all his life in vain to meet his overbearing father's expectations. "The reason why the world is in such a sloppy state," Thornton said late in his life, "is that our parents were so stupid."

Amos's support of Theodore Roosevelt led, in 1906, to his being posted in Hong Kong as consul general. He took his family with him and enrolled his children in a German-run school where they studied only six months before Amos decided that they should return with their mother to America. Papa remained in China for three years, keeping close tabs on his children's progress through correspondence.

The Wilder family came to California and settled in Berkeley for a few years until Amos was transferred to Shanghai, where his wife and children rejoined him. Now fourteen, Thornton was enrolled in a boarding school for missionaries at Chefoo. When he failed (by his father's measure) to make the grade there, he was shipped back across the sea to the school in Ojai, California, that his brother was attending. A year later, he was reunited in Berkeley with his mother and sisters and in 1915 graduated from Berkeley High School where he wrote his first play, a one-act entitled The Russian Princess—An Extravaganza!

After high school, Thornton wanted to attend Yale, his father's alma mater. But Amos thought that the worldliness of New Haven would threaten his son's well-being. Thornton was enrolled (again, along with his older brother) at Oberlin College in Ohio, an institution desirable not only for its isolated location but also for its religious atmosphere. Thornton, as a child understandably shy and withdrawn, came into his own as a college student. He prospered in his studies, participated in school dramatic productions and found a lifelong mentor in Acclaimed a modern masterpiece at the time of its first production in 1938, anthropologized in hundreds of drama collections, translated into more than thirty languages, and performed on stages around the world continuously for almost half a century, the play has always spoken very well for itself, forthrightly and in a familiar voice. With folksy appeal and an earnest belief in the dignity of the smallest events in daily life, it portrays an America younger and more innocent than our own but does so with such honesty and homely wisdom as to render the picture it presents undiminished by time. At Our Town's heart is an artful ability to recapture lost time and show the human souls it portrays to be part of a never-ending, universal cycle; to juxtapose, in no less a context than that of eternity, the life of a New Hampshire village against the life of the stars in the heavens.

Although Our Town stands handily on its own, to its author attention should be paid. Thornton Wilder was, in his lifetime, among America's leading men of letters. At the height of his fame, in the thirties and forties, he was ranked in importance with Hemingway and Fitzgerald, who were then a couple of his best pals. In his world travels, he had audiences with Popes at the Vatican, dined in Vienna with Sigmund Freud and in London with Bernard Shaw, and when in France, lodged at the villa of Gertrude Stein and Alice B. Toklas. He appeared on the cover of Time magazine, was called upon to write a movie for Hitchcock (Shadow of a Doubt) and collaborated with composer Paul Hindemith on an operatic version of his play The Long Christmas Dinner. His books sold well enough to provide princely support and also earned him, along with an international reputation, three Pulitzer Prizes. The only other writer ever to be similarly thrice honored was Eugene O'Neill, recognized in all instances, of course, for his playwriting. Wilder—and here is a measure of the position he held in the literary community—was not only an award-winning dramatist but a Pulitzer Prize novelist as well.

Thornton Niven Wilder was born in Madison, Wisconsin, on April 17, 1897, the surviving member of a set of twin boys. He was named for his mother, the former Isabella Thornton Wilder, a Presbyterian minister's daughter. Thornton's father Amos was a Congregationalist with a Ph.D. in economics from Yale and at the time of his son's birth was editor of the local newspaper.

Amos Wilder embraced the firm Calvinist attitudes of his New England ancestors and was harshly authoritarian in dealings with his children. He was ever fearful for his brood's spiritual safety and let no opportunity go by at which he might lecture his two sons and three daughters on how to defend themselves against a world full of temptation. He carefully planned each of the children's futures but from the start held out little hope for Thornton's success. The elder Wilder's disapproving nature strongly influenced his son, who strove all his life in vain to meet his overbearing father's expectations. "The reason why the world is in such a sloppy state," Thornton said late in his life, "is that our parents were so stupid."

Amos's support of Theodore Roosevelt led, in 1906, to his being posted in Hong Kong as consul general. He took his family with him and enrolled his children in a German-run school where they studied only six months before Amos decided that they should return with their mother to America. Papa remained in China for three years, keeping close tabs on his children's progress through correspondence.

The Wilder family came to California and settled in Berkeley for a few years until Amos was transferred to Shanghai, where his wife and children rejoined him. Now fourteen, Thornton was enrolled in a boarding school for missionaries at Chefoo. When he failed (by his father's measure) to make the grade there, he was shipped back across the sea to the school in Ojai, California, that his brother was attending. A year later, he was reunited in Berkeley with his mother and sisters and in 1915 graduated from Berkeley High School where he wrote his first play, a one-act entitled The Russian Princess—An Extravaganza! Another high school, Thornton wanted to attend Yale, his father's alma mater. But Amos thought that the worldliness of New Haven would threaten his son's well-being. Thornton was enrolled (again, along with his older brother) at Oberlin College in Ohio, an institution desirable not only for its isolated location but also for its religious atmosphere. Thornton, as a child understandably shy and withdrawn, came into his own as a college student. He prospered in his studies, participated in school dramatic productions and found a lifelong mentor in...
Charles H.A. Wager, a professor of literature. With Wager's encouragement, Wilder submitted several short plays to the Berlin Literary Magazine and gained his first publication credits.

At the end of his second year at Oberlin, Wilder was once again uprooted at his father's whim. Amos had come back to America and was settled in New Haven. Now he wanted his sons at Yale, and so to Yale they went. The outbreak of World War I came at the end of Thornton's first year at the university and, like many of his contemporaries, he left school to enlist in the armed services. Extreme nearsightedness, however, limited his participation to a stint in the Coast Artillery Corps, at Ford A.M. at the State in Rhode Island. Following the Armistice, Wilder returned to Yale, where he contributed a number of stories and plays to the Yale Literary Magazine while serving on the publication's editorial board in 1920, he received his undergraduate degree from Yale and prepared to embark on the career as a writer that he had chosen for himself.

But his father had other plans for him. School teaching would provide the secure means of support needed by a young man of the limited talents Amos thought his son to possess. (When a Yale professor informed him that Thornton had a genius for writing, Mr. Wilder took the man to task for "puffing my boy up beyond his parts.") To better prepare Thornton for his life as a pedant, Papa sent him to the American Academy in Rome where he could brush up his Latin by studying archaeology. Thornton basked in Rome for nine months before he received his next order, a cable advising him that he was soon to assume a teaching position already arranged for him (by guess who?) at the Lawrenceville School for Boys in Princeton, New Jersey.

Wilder spent the next six years teaching French while many of his contemporaries were actually living in France. "I am the only American of my generation," he observed with a hint of regret many years later, "who did not go to Paris." When not correcting French exercises or patrolling the dormitory of which he was master, Wilder continued work on the novel he had begun in Rome. He received a scholarship to attend the MacDowell Colony in Peterborough, New Hampshire, in 1924 and during the first of many summers he was there, he bought an artist's retreat (the New Hampshire village in Our Town is based on Peterborough), he completed his first novel. Published in 1926, The Cabala is the story of a group of New England Indians whose resemblance to the ancient gods is unmistakable. The feat of time-tripping—combining past and present worlds—that Wilder effected to critical acclaim in The Cabala which is one of the charming features of Our Town, he learned at the American Academy. "If you have ever wielded an archaeologist's pickaxe," he claimed, "you are never the same again. You see Times Square as if it were an archaeological specimen two thousand years from now."

Wilder's second novel, The Bridge of San Luis Rey, was, like many of his later plays and novels, suggested to him by another writer's work. "I do borrow from other writers, shamelessly," he once admitted. "I can only say in defense of myself that I was a woman brought before the judge on a charge of shoplifting, 'I do steal, but, your Honor, only from the very best stores.'" Borrowing, in this instance, from a play by Prosper Mérimée, Wilder fashioned what remains his most popular work of fiction. With its well-known first line—"On Friday noon, July the twentieth, 1714, the finest bridge in all Peru broke and precipitated five travelers into the vast below."—The Bridge of San Luis Rey addresses themes that recur in Our Town: the vagaries of fate, the preciousness of mortal life and the importance of appreciating fully all experience. The wildly popular, received the 1927 Pulitzer Prize for fiction and made of its author a financially secure man. It also had the unexpected effect of forcing the Peruvian government to find a real-life counterpart for the bridge Wilder had invented.

Flush with success and overtaken by international celebrity, Wilder retired from Lawrenceville and began life as a full-time writer. He built a home for his parents in Hamden, Connecticut, just outside of New Haven, and toured Europe with his sister Isabel who devoted her adult life to serving as his confidante, traveling companion and amanuensis. Wilder completed his third novel, The Woman of Andros (based on a play by Terence), while on holiday and saw it published a few months after his first collection of short plays appeared in 1928.

When Wilder returned to the United States in early 1929, he discovered that his father's Connecticut newspaper business had recently failed, making him the family's sole means of support (this brother had gone into the ministry). In order to insure continued prosperity, he accepted a half-time teaching position at the University of Chicago with which to supplement his earnings from writing and lucrative lecture tours.

Just as life seemed about to settle into a comfortable pattern, Wilder was shaken by an attack on his work that appeared in the New York public. Referring to Wilder as the "Emily Post of Culture" and the "Prophet of the Gentle Christ," the Communist critic Michael Gold took the writer to task for not addressing himself to the needs of the proletariat in his novels. "Where are the modern streets of New York, Chicago and New Orleans in these little novels?" Gold demanded, introducing a broadside in the midst of America's depression. Wilder was writing about the effete carriages of an ancient Grecian. Although Gold's attack was more emotionally rousing than intellectually sound, it stirred up a literary controversy which along with the lukewarm critical reception given to Heaven's My Destination (1934), Wilder's fourth novel, was sufficient to affect adversely his reputation as a nOvelette. It was the theatre to which Wilder turned. Over the next dozen or so years, on the strength of only three full-length plays and a handful of one-acts, he easily resuscitated his ailing reputation and became one of America's most admired playwrights. "Drama is the form of writing that comes nearest to expressing life," he asserted as he moved from fiction to playwriting. "On the stage it is always now."

The Long Christmas Dinner & Other Plays in One Act, published in 1931, contains several sketches in which Wilder developed the ideas of some of the plays that would not be produced until the empty stage for their Christmas feast. Characters enter from a portal representing birth on one side of the stage and exit through the opposite door beyond which it's understood lies death. All is orderly as one generation makes way for the next, taking the casualties it can claim through old age, war or illness. The family perseveres and survives it all, passing its legacy on down the line into the future.

Another play in the collection, Pullman Car Hiawatha, employs the figure of a stage manager to introduce the audience to the play's other characters. Everything is as scenes verbally—again there is no scenery but for a few chairs. This amiable fellow strolls through the action of the play, frequently commenting on the story as it unfolds and occasionally taking a role for himself. He turns up again in The Happy Journey to Trenton and Camden, a third one-act in the volume, this time reading his lines from a script he holds in his hand. In tone and technique this short play is very much like Our Town and, of course, the stage manager is a close cousin to the one who appears in Wilder's first full-length play.

Our Town draws not only on its author's earlier playwriting efforts but also on his novels and on other writers' works. There are touches throughout the play drawn from Edgar Lee Masters' Spoon River Anthology (the poem Lucinda Matlock is directly quoted), and the view of life after death that Wilder offers comes from Dante's Purgatory. An episode in Wilder's own The Woman from Andros provided the basis for Our Town's third act. Emily's final hymn to life in the play was first heard in only slightly different form in The Cabala, just as Rebecca's speech which closes the first act was borrowed from James Joyce's Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man. And permuting the play is the influence on Wilder of his close friend Gertrude Stein. Her belief in a human consciousness unbound by time or place—or the mind "knows what it knows when it knows it." she maintained—is given perhaps its most accessible demonstration in the marriage of past, present and future that Wilder makes in Our Town.

"I am writing the most beautiful little play you can imagine," Wilder advised Stein in October, 1937. "It's a little play with all the big subjects in it; and it's a big play with all the little things of life lovingly impressed into it." Our Town was begun in June at the MacDouwell Colony and completed before Christmas, while Wilder was visiting Europe. The playwright sent copies of his script off to Jed Harris, the preeminent theatrical producer of the day, and to a few trusted readers. Friend and playwright Edward Sheldon responded, "You've broken every rule of playwriting. You've stated no plane. No situation. You've prepared no suspense. You've resolved no tensions." But Wilder's old college professor, Charles Wager, was unequivocal in his praise for the new play. "Words fail," Wager wrote. "You have done the greatest piece of work you've ever done and I don't use the word 'great' lightly."

Jed Harris was no less thrilled by the play and quickly set about putting it on A.C.T.-16 stage. Wilder attended Our Town's first rehearsal but, disappointed by the shaky readings being given, he walked out and met with his second round of the play. He met with the same familiar with the script, he never attended another. The play premiered in Princeton and then went on to Boston for a second round of the play. He then went to New York and was well received. It didn't playgoers exactly flock to see it. Wilder blamed the play's shortcomings on alterations Harris had made in his text. "What happened to my beautiful prose?" the playwright demanded. "Prose don't play," replied the director.

With tempests flaring around, Harris decided to cut the heavy losses he was incurring during the Boston tryouts and bring the show into New York without any further ado. The play opened on Broadway at the Henry Miller Theatre on February 4, 1938—a week ahead of schedule—and was immediately recognized as a work of enormous effectiveness and tremendous emotional power. When the lengthy ovation the play received on opening night subsided, the critic Alexander Woollcott was seen leaving the theatre with tears still in his eyes. Asked his opinion of the new play, he refused to pass judgment without first reading the 23rd Psalm. "Later he explained. "In all my days as a theatregoer, no play ever moved me so deeply."

A rare opportunity to experience the success of his play firsthand presented itself to Wilder when Frank Craven, the actor who originated the role of the Stage Manager, took a week's vacation after Our Town had been playing for some time. Wilder stepped into the role and although he is reported to have had some difficulty remembering his lines, he was said to be a serviceable performance. Apparently the experience settled well with him; he subsequently played the part in many revivals of Our Town around the country. Wilder also stayed close to the play when it was sold to Hollywood, writing the screenplay for the 1940 film version, which starred most of the original Broadway cast and has a score composed by Aaron Copland. Among the play's five television productions (all produced without Wilder's direct involvement) was a 1955 musical version, featuring Paul Newman as George Gibbs and Eva Marie Saint as Emily Webb. Frank Sinatra played the part of the singing Stage Manager and introduced Jimmy Van Heusen and Sammy Cahn's soon-to-be popular tune, "Love and Marriage." Of the play's innumerable stage revivals over the years, the most warmly remembered is probably the 1969 New York production in which Henry Fonda played the Stage Manager with rare grace and good humor. Our Town (be seen again in New York this season as a musical comedy entitled Grover's Corners. Scheduled to open on Broadway May 1, the adaptation is by Tom Jones and Harvey Schmidt, the folks responsible for The Fantasticks. Our Town earned Wilder his second Pulitzer Prize (the third came in 1942 for The Skin of Our Teeth). In its published form, the play sold hundreds of thousands of copies. Wilder included in the volume a preface written just weeks after the play opened. Some years later, in an introduction to a collection of his three full-length plays (the third being The Matchmaker produced in 1954 and later made into the hit musical Hello, Dolly!), Wilder again looked at Our Town and offered some thoughts on the play. In the essay he describes how he combined his interests in archaeology and sociology to develop the central theme of the play, which he casts as a question: "What is the relation between the countless 'unimportant' details of our daily life, on the one hand, and the great perspective of time, social history and current religious ideas on the other?" The second essay amplifies the first but cautions readers and playgoers not to view the work too literally. "Our Town," Wilder writes, "is not offered as a picture of life in a New Hampshire village or as a speculation about the conditions of life after death. It is an attempt to find a value above all price for the smallest events in our daily life." In both essays Wilder empathetically conveys the importance of the script's expanding view of the world. "The recurrent words in this play," he notes, "are 'hundreds,' 'thousands,' and 'millions.'"

Wilder's attention remained fixed on dramatic writing until about the time of World War II, in which he served as an Army intelligence officer. After the war, he took up residence at his family home in Connecticut where he lived until the end of his life. He returned to writing novels, publishing The Isles of March in 1948, and to teaching, occupying the prestigious Charles Eliot Norton Chair at Harvard in 1950-51.

Over the remainder of his seventy-eight years, Wilder led a quiet life in New Haven, devoted to long walks and the study of great literature. All manner of honorary degrees, government decorations and literary citations celebrating his lifetime achievement were awarded him, but he rarely appeared to accept them. The last of his nine novels—and the most autobiographical—Thespis Nullus, was published in 1973, two years before he died at home in his sleep. "On my grave," he had predicted, "they will write: Here lies a man who tried to be obligeing."

Obliging in his art as well as his life, Wilder found wonder in aspects of human consciousness that extend far beyond hearth and home. "Something eternal," says the Stage Manager in Our Town, "and that something has to do with human beings." Half a lifetime after he wrote the classic play, The New Yorker revealed the artistic agenda that informs it. "I am interested in the drives that operate in society and in every man," he said. "Pride, avarice and envy are in every home. I am not interested in the ephemeral—such subjects as the adorables of dentists. I am interested in those things that repeat and repeat and repeat in the lives of the millions."

Since 1854, the luggage and accessories of Louis Vuitton have been the expression of a unique tradition. The "Carouche" is an entirely leather-lined shoulder bag. It is both elegant and functional. It is trimmed with naturally tanned cowhide, and stitched with the utmost care.

This attention to detail is the mark of an authentic Louis Vuitton bag. Fortunately, there is a place where the art and tradition of the master trunk-makers can be found.

When the White House asked us to cater a State Dinner for President Reagan and Queen Elizabeth II, we knew the menu had to be as memorable as the occasion itself. So for the grand finale, we created an original dessert especially in honor of the Queen.

Aurora Pacifica, as St. Francis Chef Norbert Brandt proudly named his creation, combined a subtle, orange-accented sauce, a delicate puff pastry filled with ginger sabayon, fresh strawberries and a sprig of fresh mint. Delicate lines of raspberry puree create the effect of a spectacular California sunset.

The St. Francis Catering Staff takes pride in making every event extraordinary. Which is why, for 80 years, San Franciscans and guests from around the world have chosen us to cater their affairs. Let us make your next party memorable. We'll treat you like royalty, too.
